Introduction

“Life is to explore, to discover, to delight and to be delighted.”

-Nicole Schapiro

It is 2:30 in the morning. Most of your friends are offline. You have given up the idea of ever falling asleep as you stare out the window, wondering how to make the most out of your life. You fear the comfort of your bed; not because you dread the possibility of having a nightmare, not because you hate drifting into slumber, but because you are frightened of tomorrow.

You are just that scared to wake up.

You are afraid to wake up to expectations which you are bound to convert into disappointments, anyway. You are afraid to open your eyes feeling so little and so worthless all over again. You are afraid to wake up being the same broke, unproductive loser that you think you are.

Then, left with so much vulnerability and anxiety, you ended up stalking your ex; after avoiding the idea for so long. It has been years! Now you can only wonder what have changed. Once, you both shared the same dream, vowing you'd reach it together. Once, you had some sense of worth.

Upon stumbling on the profile picture, you felt your heart skip a beat. Not because you saw your ex being more captivating than ever, but because right behind the person who used to be your dream, was yet another dream. Your dream place! A photograph of that country is even hanging on the wall of your room at the very moment!

But what has changed? How did that person get there? How could that person live in your fantasy, while all this time, you have been dwelling on melancholy? How could life be so unfair?

As you opened that profile, what you saw made you even more confused:

Your ex, now earning a fortune and living your dream life, works as a freelancer. Was that the secret? That's it? Was that all? But what could that possibly mean? For sure something happened along the way. Is there actually a sure route to success and to a sense of accomplishment?

At first it was your curiosity that introduced you to the idea of making money online. Then later, it became some sort of a challenge to test yourself if you could actually do it. Until the simple challenge became the solution to your problem. Suddenly, it was no longer about your ex at all; it was about finding yourself again. It was dreaming all over again.

Then before knowing it, you didn't have to prove your worth anymore. You felt it. You believed it. You lived it.

It all started when you began earning a hundred dollar a day.

Eventually, you were not just looking at your dream place from someone's profile picture or from a photograph hanging on your room. You are staring at it while holding the key to your new home.

You became the person who used to be the subject of your envy every time you stare out of your window every 2:30 a.m. You became the kind of person you once thought you will never, ever be.

Sounds too dreamy? Well pull up a chair and all eyes here because we are about to start making it real.

All set? Good. Now think about the last time you ever failed on something. It could be a relationship, school, a task, money— anything. Dwell upon the agony of failure— of the potential for success that did not come to life. Extract old wounds and let them bleed again.

I bet it's dripping, already.

Remember how it made you feel like you will never be good enough? That no matter what you do, you are just not going to make things right? That you just don't have it in you?

What if today is the day you work to claim what you deserve from life?

Before we proceed, I want you look at your palm and close it so hard into a fist that the veins of the back of your hand would pop. Now, imagine a hundred fireflies coming out of those veins. Could you do it? I want you to shut your eyes so hard, imagine you're staring at very own brand-new car, then open your eyes and look at that same car with you on the driver's seat. Could you do it? Lastly, I want you to whisper your name seven times and think about it coming out from the mouth of a genie. Could you do it?

If you were able to do at least one of the three, then congratulations! You have just successfully completed a task. And those were not just simple activities! They were tasks that required an open mind and creativity. You allowed your mind to work because you feel like you could, and you did. You directed your brain into something it did not initially plan, and you commanded it to put your senses to work.

But what could that possibly do with making a hundred dollar a day, online?

Honey, has anybody ever told you that every journey starts with the first step? Tell you what, all of those folks who ever told you that piece of cliché of were lying! If you do step one right away, how would you know where you are going? You'd end up tripping, wandering and lost— like you always were... before today.

No, a good journey doesn't start with the first step. Remember this: every action should start with an intention. When you put your imagination at work a while ago, you already proved to yourself that you can redirect your thoughts into an exploration. You can think. You can intend. You can pretend. And that's step zero— one of the most important parts of making a hundred dollar every single day. Acknowledge your own creativity and resourcefulness, and do not dwell on all the reasons why it could be impossible. Look ahead. Stop sulking and get your mind to work.

I'm not talking about that troubled mind that had it rough through all the failures, but the mind of the child that once said:

“When I grow up, I want to be successful.”

To achieve your goal, you will need that child with you. Don't ever let that brat go. Because I am sure that the last time you did so was the same time you failed. No matter what, I want you to look at the eyes of that child. He (or she) is counting on you to make it happen. When you think no one else will put their trust in your cleverness and grit, that child always will.

Yes, you may have failed several times before this, but just the mere fact that you can tell your mind to put your eyes, your mouth and your hand into motion a while ago, already proves that you can be ready to make use of your creativity and teach your mind to get things done.

Imagine a work life where you make your own rules, you set your own pace, you choose the place, and you earn a hundred dollar a day... or even more. But that will not happen without the carefree little kid that you were, and the responsible adult that you are teaming up to make the biggest change in your life thus far. Both of you deserve that gift that awaits you. Hold hands and grab it together.

Are you up for the challenge?

Think about it.
