TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

It is important to note that the earlier English translations of the LXX by Thomson and Brenton were based on editions of the Greek version that essentially reproduced the text of Codex Vaticanus. While this important manuscript preserves an excellent text for most books of the LXX, it is less trustworthy in the case of Esaias. (R. R. Ottley, for his translation, used Codex Alexandrinus, our best available witness for Esaias.) As a result, the reader will find a large number of textual differences between those earlier English translations and the present one, which is based on the full-fledged critical edition of J. Ziegler (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum XIV: Isaias [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967]).

Ziegler's reconstructed text is very similar to that found in Rahlfs' Septuaginta. If we set aside differences that do not show up in an English translation (primarily Greek orthographic variants), we find approximately ninety places where the two editions differ, and many of these variations are relatively minor. I have accepted Ziegler's judgment in all but sixteen of these (10.7; 13.3; 14.27; 26.18; 28.2-3; 41.29[bis]; 42.4; 49.13; 50.3; 51.16; 54.5; 55.13; 56.5; 61.3; 63.12), some of which involve conjectural emendations that are reasonable, even brilliant, but not totally persuasive. In addition, there are two places where Rahlfs and Ziegler agree but where I have reluctantly gone my own way (9.1[8.23] and 53.11; in the latter passage I have accepted an old conjectural emendation).

Many readers of NETS will not have easy access to Ziegler's edition. If they use the present translation in conjunction with Rahlfs' text, it will often be unclear whether departures from the latter are only apparent (the result of a non-literal rendering) or substantial (the result of a textual variation). Since NETS includes textual notes only when it departs from the base text (Ziegler), it may be helpful to the reader to have a list of those verses where the present translation reflects a text different from Rahlfs' edition.

They are as follow: 2.20; 5.9; 5.29; 7.6; 8.18; 9.4(3); 10.1; 10.10(bis); 10.22; 11.5; 12.2; 12.6(bis); 13.3; 14.13; 15.2; 15.4; 16.3; 16.5; 16.7; 17.5; 17.6; 18.7; 20.1; 21.13; 22.1; 23.13; 23.16; 25.5; 25.9; 28.15; 29.8; 30.14; 30.33; 33.18; 34.10; 36.19; 37.12; 37.13; 37.32; 37.38; 40.4; 40.25; 40.28; 41.23; 43.17; 44.16; 45.4; 45.9; 45.13; 46.11; 47.10; 48.5(bis); 48.16; 49.6; 49.7; 49.15; 51.5; 53.2; 54.3; 54.8; 54.10; 54.17(bis); 56.11; 58.11(bis); 60.6; 61.4; 61.8; 65.11; 65.23; 66.8(bis); 66.17(misprint).

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

Attempts to evaluate the Greek translation of Esaias in the past have typically failed to note the complexity of such a task. One can find numerous passages where the translator has failed to understand the Hebrew text and where his Greek appears to be solecistic and even unintelligible. It is therefore natural to infer that he lacked competence. The problem with this conclusion, however, is that it does not take into account the skill, knowledge and creativity that he displays in many other passages. Moreover, any generalizations about the translator's technique run afoul of the startling variations in his approach.

Consider, for example, the first half dozen verses in chapter 43. It is apparent that the translator had no trouble whatever understanding the Hebrew text and that he was capable of representing the meaning of the original in simple, clear and faultless Greek. His approach here may be characterized as moderately literal, resulting in a certain quaintness of style that betrays its Semitic background. Admittedly, the Hebrew of this passage is not particularly difficult. Elsewhere, if the translator encounters a rare word, he seems to lose his bearings. In 28.20, the Hebrew appears to mean, "For the bed is [too] short for stretching, and the covering [too] narrow for gathering [i.e., wrapping] oneself." Here the Hebrew words for "bed" (which appears nowhere else in the Bible) and "stretching" (which is rare) stumped the translator. Exercising his imagination, he came up with this, "We are in straits and unable to fight, and we ourselves are too weak to be mobilized." We should remember, however, that even modern scholarship is less than confident about the meaning of numerous sentences in the Hebrew text of Isaiah.

In some of his renderings, the translator appears to be slavishly literal, but it is clear that, as a whole,

he felt free to vary his vocabulary and restructure the syntax if it served his purposes. That sense of freedom allowed him at times to go off on tangents that have little connection with the Hebrew. Indeed, on occasions the meaning of his translation is patently contrary to that of the original (cf. the negative he introduces at 8.14, “you will not encounter him as a stumbling caused by a stone”). What may have been going on in his mind at those times is an intriguing question, but we would be wrong to infer that he was unconcerned about being faithful to the text. There can be no doubt that he struggled mightily to make sense of difficult passages, and that even when he seems to go beyond the text, he is sensitive to the thrust of the book as a whole and seeks to come up with teachings that are up-building (note that at the beginning of 8.14 the addition of the clause “if you trust in him” effectively links this verse with a recurring theme in the book).

All of this means that we cannot easily describe lexical and grammatical patterns in the translator’s handling of the Hebrew text. Some can certainly be identified, but the exceptions to those patterns are significant, and they prevent us from making many valid generalizations. As we might expect, he follows some of the lexical equations established by the Greek translators of the Pentateuch, such as $\text{tyrb} =$ diaqh/kh in the sense of “covenant.” For Hebrew $\text{lw}\#$ he normally uses 3Aidhj (“Hades”), but in 28.15, 18 we find qa/natoj , “death.” There is no need to multiply examples. Beyond these more-or-less standard calques, the translator naturally comes up with a few equivalences of his own, but not in uniform fashion. With regard to syntax, while his tendency is to follow the simple structure of the Hebrew clauses, he does not hesitate to introduce variety and to exploit some of the resources of the Greek language; still, many of the niceties one routinely finds in original Greek composition are missing. Special note should be made of the translator's fairly consistent representation of the Hebrew perfect tense (which can have various temporal references) with the Greek aorist (a simple past tense). Although the choice of the aorist is appropriate when the context clearly indicates a past action or a gnomic idea (e.g., 1.3, "The ox knew [=knows] its owner"), his overuse of this tense lends a distinct and odd quality to his translation.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF ESAIAS

Given the Greek translator's inconsistent approach (or so it appears to us), an English translation of his work faces special problems. The challenges are compounded by the need to follow the pattern of the NRSV. Numerous stylistic variations frequently used by the latter (as it renders the Hebrew text) introduce an additional and deeper level of inconsistency to the endeavor.

The user of NETS deserves to know that the present translation has gone through two distinct stages.

The initial draft reflected a special effort not only to understand what the Greek translator meant (for which the sense of the Hebrew is an important piece of evidence), but also to communicate that meaning in fairly clear and natural English when possible (often the irregularities of the Greek called for less than fluent English). That first draft, in addition, sought to maximize the potential for NETS/NRSV synoptic study; in other words, it preserved NRSV renderings whenever these could be defended as reasonable representations of the Greek.

In the opinion of the editors, however, such an approach was inconsistent with the aim of NETS to represent not only what the Greek says but also how it is being said. For the sake of uniformity with the project as a whole, therefore, hundreds of changes were made that result in unclear or even unnatural English (e.g., "wept with weeping"). Moreover, the reader should be advised not to assume that a difference between NETS and NRSV reflects a difference between the Hebrew and the Greek.

Even in the first draft of this translation, NRSV renderings were changed in cases where the Hebrew is idiomatic but the Greek equivalence appears odd. In particular, note that the Greek translator fairly consistently translates the Hebrew #y) (“man”) with a1nqrwpoj, even in passages where such an equivalence is inappropriate, including instances when the Hebrew has a distributive meaning, “each.” The Greek translator is quite capable of rendering these uses idiomatically. For example, in 13.8, the Hebrew #y) wh(r l) (lit., “a man to his neighbor”) is rendered e3teroj pro\j to\n e3teron (“one to another”). It seems advisable to render the Greek to English literally in cases where the Greek inappropriately renders the Hebrew literally. The reader of NETS will thus notice a large number of instances of the singular “man”; the unusual flavor of the resulting English corresponds to some extent with the peculiar quality of the Greek.

The strophic arrangement of the NRSV has been followed as much as possible to facilitate comparison, but it must not be thought that the Greek always has a corresponding poetic quality.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

I have profited greatly from R. R. Ottley, The Book of Isaiah according to the LXX (Codex Alexandrinus) (3 vols; London: Cambridge University Press, 1904–1906). The first volume contains an important introduction (including a discussion of the Greek translator's "Method of Rendering") and a translation of the Hebrew and the Greek on facing pages. Volume 2 presents the Greek text with a critical apparatus, followed by extensive notes that pay special attention to the divergences between the Greek translation and the Hebrew original. A third, slim volume simply includes the text by itself.

Joseph Ziegler's Untersuchungen zur Septuaginta des Buches Isaias (Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen 12/3; Münster: Aschendorff, 1934), which may be regarded as a prolegomenon to his critical edition, remains to this day the most penetrating and reliable source of information. The highly regarded mono-graph by I. L. Seeligmann, The Septuagint Version of Isaiah: A Discussion of Its Problems (Leiden: Brill, 1948), has chapters on textual criticism, translation technique, historical background and Jewish theology. More recently, Arie van der Kooij has produced a very full and helpful analysis of one chapter, The Oracle of Tyre: The Septuagint of Isaiah XXIII as Version and Vision (VTSup 71; Leiden: Brill, 1998).

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I wish to express my appreciation to my former student assistant Carl Franzon (Byington Scholar at Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary) for producing an initial collation showing the textual differences between the editions of Rahlfs and Ziegler. His careful labor greatly facilitated my subsequent work.

I am also greatly indebted to Albert Pietersma for his thorough review of the initial translation. His sharp eye saved me from embarrassment at numerous points, and his mastery of Greek and LXX studies improved the quality of the work in significant ways.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of Ieremias is based on the critical edition of Joseph Ziegler (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Societatis Litterarum Gottingensis editum XV: Ieremias Baruch Threni Epistula Ieremiae [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1957]), though in a number of instances, notably in chapter 43, we have deviated from Ziegler's edition. The deviation in 52.24 ("way" > "threshold") NETS owes to J. Smith.¹ No systematic and thorough text-critical reassessment has, however, been carried out.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

General Character

Given that, according to opinio communis, Greek Jeremiah (hereafter Ieremias) is based on a Hebrew text substantially at variance with MT, a comparison of the Greek with its source text is no straightforward task.

It is nevertheless reasonably clear that the most basic norm of the translator (hereafter Ier²) was that of isomorphism. That is to say, typically each morpheme of the source text is represented in the target text. This is true not only of so-called content words (lexemes) but as well of structure words. For example, Hebrew articles, notae accusativi, infinitival prefix l, personal pronouns (even when rendered superfluous by Greek inflection), pronominal suffixes, pleonastic pronouns and adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions are all regularly represented, whether or not such representation results in standard Greek usage. Though certain structural items are at times added in deference to Greek usage, this occurs almost exclusively at the level of phrase and clause and rarely at the level of discourse. Moreover, deference to Greek literary style was often trumped by Ier's isomorphism, as a result of which Greek articles are notably in short supply.

Be it noted, however, that isomorphism need not mean lexical or grammatical consistency. Thus Hebrew prepositions may at times trigger Greek articles, in the same sort of way that a Hebrew lexeme may be assigned a number of Greek counterparts, differentiated according to contextual demand, whether linguistic or expositional, even though the context may be rather narrowly conceived.

In spite of its isomorphism, Ieremias is usually intelligible though rarely elegant. Yet the reader encounters many instances of unintelligibility. As good an example as any is perhaps 52.19, the more since it contains transcriptions (see further below): kai\ ta\ saffwq kai\ ta\ masmarwq kai\ tou\j u9poxuth~raj kai\ ta\j luxni/aj kai\ ta\j qui/skaj kai\ tou\j kua/qouj, a4 h]n xrusa~ xrus~a kai4 \ha]n argura~ragura~l,ae ben o9 a0rxima/geiroj. Though this line is an exact representation of the Hebrew source text—which was evidently very much like MT—what was a Greek reader without access to the Hebrew to make of it? NETS has glossed it as: “And the chief cook took away the saphphoth and the masmaroth and the pitchers and the lampstands and the censers and the ladles, which were gold gold and which were silver silver,” with a few notes attached to help the reader of English. Problems encountered by ler in the source text are typically passed on to the reader. Difficulties, too, may be caused by uncertain referents/antecedents of pronominals (e.g., 27.44; 29.14, 20; 42.2). Especially the Oracles Against the Nations (OAN) present many uncertainties of various kinds. All the same, ler is not totally oblivious to Greek literary conventions. So for example in 4.23–26 he renders the fourfold yty)r (“I looked at”) of his source into two pairs of e0pe/bleya . . . ei]don. All in all, though, Ieremias often lacks semantic transparency, because too little attention was paid to units of discourse beyond the clausal level.

Stipp rightly notes that “diese Übersetzung auf sprachliche Glätte wenig Rücksicht nahm und in äs-thetischer Hinsicht ihren Lesern nicht entgegenkam.”³

Of Consistency and Inconsistency

Though Jer's most basic norm is that of isomorphism, as noted, this does not need to mean a heavy emphasis on lexical/grammatical consistency. As a result, predictable Hebrew-Greek equivalency and isomorphism may be quite distinct. While lack of consistency can suggest different agents—whether translators or revisers—it is equally true that one and the same agent may make use of such inconsistency to slip into his text interpretive elements, whether of purely local import or possibly with a larger scope. We are here interested in such marked usage, especially those instances that are not readily explained as obligatory differentiation in the target language. Here we note some interesting examples. Though the textual facts are clear, the reasons for them are not always so. In each case, the item in question is distributed throughout the book.

Variation at the Word Level

1a nekro/j (“corpse”) 7.33; 9.22; 19.7; 40.5

1b qnhsimai=on (“carcass”) 16.18; 41.20; 43.30

In all but 40.5 the Hebrew term is hlbn, used for a dead body of human and animal alike. Though in this case one can scarcely speak of a default Hebrew-Greek equivalency, the difference in rendering nevertheless invites examination. Since Greek, like English, differentiates, one might expect that 1a denotes deceased humans and 1b dead animals. When one finds that, in fact, both terms are used to describe human dead, qnhsimai=on shows itself to be a marked usage and based on contextual considerations. So it seems safe to say that ler did not think well of King loakim, alive or dead (43.30). As might be expected, in Leuitikon (Leviticus) qnhsimai=on is standard, with the sole exception of 21.5 where reference is made to a human.

2a a0llo/trioi qeoi/ (“strange/foreign gods”) 1.16; 5.19; 7.6, 9, 18; 11.10; 13.10; 16.11; 19.4, 13; 22.9; 25.6. In all instances, with the exception of 5.19 (=rkn), a0llo/trioi is a rendition of rx.

2b e3teroi qeoi/ (“other gods”) 16.13; 39.29; 42.15; 51.3, 5, 8, 15. All cases gloss rx.

The default in this case is reasonably clear. Reasonably clear too would seem to be ler’s reason for differentiation. Though Israel’s pursuit of “foreign ways” is already noted in the Hebrew source text, signaled notably by Myrz (2.25; 3.13; 5.19; 18.14; 37[30].8) and rkn (2.21; 5.19; 8.19; 19.4)—all nine glossed by a0llo/trioj—ler makes it more explicit by differentiating between the worship of “strange/foreign gods” in the homeland (e.g., 5.19) and the worship of “other (non-Yahweh) gods” once the people have been forced to leave their homeland. The same difference in perspective can be seen in Deuteronomy between chapters 4–30 (e3teroj), on the one hand, and 31–32 (a0llo/trioj), on the other, though Deut 31.16 and 32.12 have explicit warrant for differentiation in the Hebrew.

3a profh/thj (“prophet”) 1.5; 2.8, 26, 30; 4.9; 5.13, 31; 7.25; 8.1; 13.13; 14.13, 14, 15(bis), 18; 18.18; 23.6, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 21, 25, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34; 25.4; 28.59; 33.5; 34.12, 13, 15; 35.8, 9(bis); 36.15; 39.32; 42.15; 44.19; 49.2; 50.6; 51.4, 31.

3b yeudoprofh/thj (“pseudo-prophet”) 6.13; 33.7, 8, 11, 16; 34.7; 35.1; 36.1, 8. In both cases, all the glosses are for)ybn.

ler’s standard gloss is patently obvious and both items are distributed throughout the book, although not evenly so. Be it noted, however, that when “pseudo-prophet” appears on the scene “prophet” by no means disappears. Since a prophet does not become a pseudo-prophet (a word which arguably originated with ler) by prophesying by Baal (2.8) nor by prophesying what is wrong (5.31) or lies in the Lord’s name (23.25) nor by not having been sent by the Lord (14.15) nor by being defiled (23.11) or causing defilement (23.15) nor by rendering a vision empty (23.16) or projecting his own thoughts (23.26), it is not immediately clear how a prophet could become a pseudo-prophet. Yet, it is in fact quite possible that ler is basing his differentiation on ler 35.9 (= Deut 18.22). That is to say, a prophet is shown to be a pseudo-prophet when what he predicts does not happen. Since after the panoramic overview of 1–32, chapter 33.1 starts the tale of the book anew on a more horizontal plane (see further below), it makes sense that pseudo-prophets should not be shown to exist until chapter

33. Though the term already appears proleptically in 6.13, it does not become applicable until the predicted events are beginning to unfold.

4a a1rxwn (“magistrate/ruler”) 1.18; 2.26; 4.9; 8.1; 17.25 (bis); 24.1; 30.3; 31.7; 32.4; 33.10, 11, 12, 16, 21; 39.32; 41.19, 21; 42.4; 43.12, 14, 21; 44.14, 15; 45.22, 25, 27; 51.17, 21; 52.10. All translate r#.

a1rxwn further has no translation equivalent in 51.9.

to the reader of ieremias

4b h9gemw&n (“leader”) 45.17; 46.3(bis); 47.7, 13; 48.11, 13, 16; 49.1, 8; 50.4, 5. All translate r#.

h9gemw&n further translates hxp in 28.23, 57 (cf. v. 28).

4c dunasth/j (“one with power”) 41.19. Though this term translates r#, it functions as a replacement for Ml#wry yr#. Evidently, ler did not know what to do with the sequence yr# of Judah and yr# of Jerusalem.

4d megista/n (“noble”) 24.8; 25.18; 27.35; 32.5; 41.10. All translate r#. megista/n further translates rd) in 14.3.

Though 4a is ler’s default, 4a, 4b and 4d have wide distribution in the book. Since for ler the a1rxontej are clearly local magistrates, such terminology is evidently deemed inappropriate when the source text speaks of military personnel. That the latter should appear predominantly in later chapters of the book is simply a matter of contents. Both a1rxwn and h9gemw&n are apparently deemed inappropriate when the social elites come into view. ler clearly does not adhere to a lexical correspondence but differentiates based on context.

5a e0nte/l omai (“command”) 1.7, 17; 7.22, 23(bis), 31; 11.4(bis); 13.5, 6; 14.14; 17.22; 19.5; 23.32; 27.21; 28.59; 29.7; 39.23; 42.6, 10, 14, 18; 43.5, 8, 26; 45.10, 27.

5b sunta/ssw (“instruct”) 33.2, 8; 34.3; 36.23; 39.13, 35; 41.22; 44.21. In both cases all the glosses are for hwc pi.

Again ler’s default rendering of the source item is not in doubt nor, for that matter, that this rendering occurs throughout the book, as a result of which the marked item stands in bold relief. It is of interest that, although ʿntw/ʾm is the Septuagintal favorite, most other books show a comparable mix of the two terms. A quick count of the Pentateuch reveals the following statistics: ʿntw/ʾm Gen 18 x, Ex 18 x, Leu 16 x, Num 18 x, Deut 82 x; ʾm/ʾm Gen 2 x, Ex 3 x, Leu 12 x, Num 27 x, Deut 2 x. That synonymy determined translational usage to a degree is likely, but it can hardly be the whole story. If ʿntw/ʾm connotes “to give definite orders, implying authority or official function” (emphasis added), as Louw and Nida⁴ note (33.329), not only does the deuteronomic imbalance become understandable, given the nature of the book, but also the occasional use of ʾm/ʾm in Ieremias. A case in point is 39.13 in distinction from 43.5, 8. While in the former the prophet gives Baruch instructions (ʾm/ʾm) about the safekeeping of a business document, the issue in the latter is that, since Ieremias is in custody, Baruch is commissioned (ʿntw/ʾm) to read Ieremias’ book of oracles in the temple.

What is at issue in the all-too-few examples offered above is not, in the first instance, a “correct” matching of source text and target text but a differentiation in the target language due to context. Hence the variations are not formal but semantic.

Variation at the Phrase/Clause Level

When one moves from the word level to the phrase/clause level, inconsistency for the same Hebrew continues, though again against a general background of consistency. A few examples will have to suffice.

6a ʾm/ʾm to\ ʾm/ʾm 21.10 (cf. 24.6 ʾm/ʾm ʾm/ʾm)

6b di/dwmi to\ pro/swpon 49.15

6c ti/qhmi to\ pro/swpon 49.17 (cf. 47.4 ti/qhmi o0fqalmou/j)

6d e0fi/sthmi to\ pro/swpon 51.11.

In the four chief instances the gloss is for ynp M# (“set the face”), with the two added ones for yn(M#

(“set the eye”). That 21.10 and 24.6 should use the same Greek verb might be expected in view of close similarity in context, but that 49.15 and 49.17 should differ is more difficult to explain, since reference is being made to the same act by the same group of people. Similarly unclear is the reason for e0fi/sthmi in 51.11. The point to be made, however, is that the translator’s choice though governed by isomorphism, is evidently not necessarily governed by lexical consistency with the source text.

A second example occurs in chapter 41. The Hebrew idiom, tyrb trk (“make a covenant”), occurs four times within this chapter, namely in vv. 8, 13, 15, 18, but in three different forms.

7a suntele/w diaqh/khn 41.8, 15

7b diati/qhmai diaqh/khn 41.13

7c poie/w diaqh/khn 41.18

Given the fact that the standard Septuagintal equivalent for tyrb trk is diati/qhmai diaqh/khn (at times with the simplex verb) and that both Ier 39.40 and 41.13 feature this idiom, the two deviant forms 4 J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida, Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament Based on Semantic Domains (2 vols.; New York: United Bible Societies, 1988).

come as a surprise, the more since they appear nowhere else in the Septuagint. The issue for Ier in all three verses is evidently the same, namely, that the diaqh/kh in question is not the covenant made with Israel by divine initiative. In 41.8, 15 it is an agreement for release between Sedekias and the people. Verse 18 in both MT (34.18) and LXX contains a possible reference to the golden calf episode (Ex 32), but in the latter the diaqh/kh of Sedekias and his ilk is thrashed along with the calf—even though it is rather woodenly expressed.

Earlier in Ieremias a similar level of variation obtains both in the Hebrew > Greek direction and vice versa.

8a ta/ssw + O(bject) + OC (object complement) 2.15; 3.19

8b ti/qhmi + O(bject) + OC (object complement) 13.16
(pass. transformation); 22.6; 27.3

8c di/dwmi + O(bject) + OC (object complement) 38.31

In all six cases the Hebrew verb is ty# (“put/set”)

9a kata/skion (cu/lon) 2.20

9b a0lsw~de(jcu/lon) 3.6; 3.13; 17.8

9c eu0ski/on (cu/lon) 11.16

What is of interest here is not only that all three translate Hebrew Nn(r) and that all have reference to “trees,” but that in 2.20; 3.6, 13 these trees are sites of whoredom, as a result of which one might have expected kata/skioj to have been used in all three. On the other hand, in 11.16 and 17.8 a flourishing tree is a metaphor for louda (Judah) and for a person who trusts in the Lord respectively. Thus one might expect the same descriptive to have been used. Again, the central point to be made is that ler was not stuck on strict lexical correspondence even when the contexts are similar or identical.

We close the discussion in this section with a rather lengthy doublet, namely, ler 10.12-17 and 28(51).15-19. While the two passages are identical in MT (apart from the added “Israel” in 10.16), the Greek shows some rather remarkable differences:

The point here is that even when one makes due allowance for textual difference between MT and the source text of Ier, one is still left with a considerable number of both stylistic and interpretational differences—and that in what is a patent doublet on the Hebrew side.

Transcriptions

Transcriptions of Hebrew—as well as some translations that might better have been transferred as transcriptions—are found in considerable number throughout Ieremias. In some cases Ier may have had a source text different from MT, while at other times his source text may have been unintelligible to him.

Be that as it may, our interest here, again, is in translational norms. As noted above, a basic norm for Ier was that of isomorphism, i.e., that each morpheme of the source text be represented in the target text.

The transcriptions give plenty of evidence of that. Accordingly, items are transcribed even though they make little or no sense in the target text: asida (8.7), agour (8.7), manaa (17.26; 48[41].5), aided (31[48].33; 32.16[25.30], siwnim (38[31].21), timrwrim (38[31].21), asarhmq (38[31].40), saffwq (52.19), masmarwq (52.19); similarly, transcriptions are supplied with articles when the source text has an article and/or nota accusativi, gender and number being gleaned from the source: th=j xarsiq (19.2), th\n xereq (44[37].16), ta\ saffwq (52.19), ta\ masmarwq (52.19).

Also noted above—against the backdrop of lexical and grammatical consistency—was that Ier often deviates from defaults for, at times, clearly contextual reasons. That too is reflected in the transcriptions.

Although one finds oi1mmoi ku/rie for Nwd) ywh (“O lord”) in 22.18, in 41(34).5 we have w@ adwn. Likewise, manaa for hxnm (“grain offering”) occurs in 17.26 and 48(41).5 while qusi/a and dw~ro(nMT hxwnm) appear respectively in 14.12 and 28(51)59—both well attested glosses in the LXX. For lxn (“brook”) we have naxal in 38(31).40, xeima/rrouj in 29(47).2 and diw~ruicn 38(31).9, and for hrcb (“Bozrah”) 31(48).24 has Bosor, but 29.23(49.22) has o0xurw&mata au0th~jT.hirdly, there is evidence here of ler’s penchant for working at the lower levels of constituent structure at the expense of the larger units of discourse. One such case is Arxabin in 42(35).2. Though the Hebrew is a plural gentilic, the Greek transcription is a (singular) name. In the following clause ler fails to represent the plural suffixes by singular pronouns, thereby creating a puzzling text. A reverse example is 29.14(49.13) where e0n me/sw au0th=j represents hrcb (“Bozrah”). Though it may be that, as BHS suggests, the source text differed from MT, the point at issue remains: What can “in her midst” mean in the context? Of a similar kind is ler’s misreading of rwcx (“Hazor”) throughout the Oracle Against Kedar (30.6[49.28], 8[30], 11[33]) as au0lh/

(rcx). Yet another, very awkward one, is par 0 e0mou~ for ynm (“Minni”) in a series of names. For additional transcriptions see Sor (21.13), lwsedek (23.6), Sawn esbi emwhd (26[46].17), Enakim (29[47].5), Aiqan (27[50].44; 29.20[49.19]), Kedem (30.6[49.28]), Ataq and Atat (31[48].1, 39), Zogora (31[48].4, cf. v.

34), Akkariwq (31(48)41), fasek (38[31].8), aselishl (45[38].14), and finally an inflected example: xauw~ne(j7.18; 51[44].19).

In sum, the transcriptions are a good index to the book’s textual-linguistic makeup.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF IEREMIAS

This translation aims to be a faithful representation of the Greek text, including many of the warts one finds along the way. In that light the reader should not be surprised to encounter from time to time less than felicitous or even questionable English. For example, since the use of pleonastic adverbs and pronouns is characteristic of the translator's isomorphism, we have tried to mimic this usage without, we hope, producing unintelligible English. As a result, 11.11 e.g., reads "Behold I am bringing evil upon this people from which they will not be able to escape from it" rather than without the final two words. The translation is therefore often one of formal equivalence, reflective of the relationship deemed to exist between the Greek and its Hebrew source.

In an effort to capture the distinctiveness of some of the key, recurring formulae in Ieremias, we have opted for "This is what the Lord says" (ta/de le/gei ku/rioj) and "says the Lord" (le/gei ku/rioj) in distinction from "Thus did the Lord say" (ou3twj ei]pe ku/rioj) and "quoth the Lord" (fhsi\ ku/rioj). Though

"quoth" is admittedly not current English usage and in form is said to be past tense, it has the distinct advantage of underscoring the quotative use of fhsi/.5

Though NETS has followed the NRSV in its formatting of Hebrew prose in distinction from poetry, this 5 For a discussion of the bisectioning of Greek Jeremiah, see <http://ccat.sas.upenn.edu/nets/edition/> Prophetical Books, Ieremias, "To the Reader of Ieremias."

should not be taken to mean either that the Greek translator made a conscious distinction between the two or that the Greek text contains poetry.

In pursuance of NETS policy, footnotes have been kept to a minimum, though we have supplied certain helps to the English reader that would not have been available to a Greek reader.

BAROUCH

TO THE READER

EDITION OF GREEK TEXT

The New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of Barouch (Baruch) is based on the critical edition of Joseph Ziegler (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Societatis Litterarum Gottingensis editum XV: Ieremias Baruch Threni Epistula Ieremiae [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1957]).

LITERARY MAKE-UP

Barouch, an “apocryphal” text of five chapters, is a composite collection of different literary genres that divides easily into two sections.

Bar 1.1-3.8

The first section (1.1-3.8), written in prose, uses the historical background of the Babylonian captivity as a context for presenting what is essentially an admission of guilt read to the captives in Babylon. Included is an expression of hope that God will deliver them from their deserved fate. The liturgical purpose of offering sacrifices at the Jerusalem temple (1.10-11) places a focus on where the captives came from. Interestingly, God is continually addressed in the third person until 2.11 when suddenly there is a switch to second person followed by some first person references (2.23, 29-35) before returning to second person references until 3.8. There are considerable linguistic ties with the book of Ieremias in the first section suggesting, if not a shared authorship, then perhaps a common Greek translator.

Bar 3.9-5.9

The style of the second part turns suddenly into a poetic homily. Though the Greek itself from the perspective of Greek metrics is not poetry, it does reflect Hebrew poetic technique in terms of form and style.

It begins at 3.9 with a plea to Israel, addressed in the second person, to contemplate wisdom and God's law and the relationship between them. At 4.5 there is a change in the subject matter wherein the author seeks to comfort the captives (four times they are urged to "take courage": 4.5, 21, 27, 30). This second section (3.9-5.9) shifts from focusing on the land they came from to the land they now reside in. Along with a genre and a subject change, there is also a noticeable adjustment in attitude toward the Babylonian captors in this second section. Whereas they are instructed to pray for the lives of their captors in the first section (1.11), they are informed of God's future destruction of them in the second section (4.25, 31-32).

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

Barouch as a Translation

Barouch is a fascinating book from the perspective of translation since, despite the fact that there are no extant Hebrew versions, it is held almost unanimously among scholars that the first section (1.1–3.8) was originally written in Hebrew. This conclusion is based on the kind of Greek that is apparent in the text and the fact that some phrases are unclear without recourse to a Hebrew retroversion. There are possible mistranslations of an original Hebrew. So, for example, 3.4, “those of Israel who have died,” might have been a misreading of $\gamma\tau\mu$ “men,” which when unvocalized can be read as “dead” (see Esa 5.13), and 2.25, “by dispatch,” might have been a misreading of $\rho\beta\delta$ “famine.” There are also many pronounced Hebraisms of the Greek in this portion, such as sustained parataxis with $\kappa\alpha\iota$ (“and”) or $\alpha\lambda\eta\lambda\omega\tau\omega\sigma$ (“person”) for distributive $\#\eta$ (“each”) or again pleonastic adverbs, $\text{ou}[\dots\text{e}0\text{kei}=\text{ (“where . . . there”)} (2.4, 13, 29; 3.8)$, and pronouns, e.g., $\omega\{\text{n} \dots \text{au}0\text{tw}\sim(\text{n}$ “of whom of them”) in 2.17.

Emanuel Tov has made a Hebrew retroversion of this first section. His intent was to show how the translator of Barouch showed affinities with the translation of Jeremiah (Ieremias). Tov theorizes that the entire book of Jeremiah had originally been translated into Greek as a unit and then, subsequently, was revised but that only the second half of that revision (chaps. 29–52 of Ieremias) has survived. Tov fur-to the reader of barouch

thermore postulates that the same reviser also revised Bar 1.1-3.8. Since Ieremias is clearly based on a Hebrew original, its affinities with the first section of Barouch (1.1-3.8) provide solid support for an original Hebrew of this section.

Barouch as Greek Composition

The second section (3.9–5.9) is the subject of much debate concerning its original language. On the one hand, there is a general Greek character to it. It also possesses one Septuagintal hapax legomenon, the muqolo&goi “storytellers” (3.23), and several words, many of which are neologisms, that only appear here in all of the Septuagint, i.e., summiai/nw “to be defiled with” (3.11), makrobi/wsj “longevity” (3.14), antani/sthmi “to rise up against” (3.19), the e0kzhthtai/ “seekers” (3.23), e0pimh&khj “extensive” (3.24), la&myij “shining” (4.2) and dekaplasia&zw “to multiply by ten” (4.28). Add to these data the facts that 4.36–5.9 has strong parallels with the Greek version of the Psalms of Solomon 11 and that the phraseology of 4.28 is difficult to reconstruct back into biblical Hebrew, and one might have good grounds to argue for an original Greek composition.

On the other hand, the literary style, especially the use of the vocative or the imperative and the strong use of parallelism, allow for the possibility of a Hebrew original. There are also a few instances where the Greek appears to be a mistranslation of the Hebrew, such as the unique appearance of the city Merran (3.23), which may have been a Hebrew corruption of Midian (the r and d in Hebrew are easily confused), followed by the Greek doubling of the r, which occurs occasionally in the transliteration of Hebrew proper names (e.g., Sarra in LXX Gen 17.19 and Gomorra in LXX Gen 18.20). David G. Burke has produced his own retroversion of this second section based on the conclusion that it was originally composed in Hebrew. Despite Burke’s ability to retrovert this section into Hebrew, however, the evidence for this section being translation Greek is by no means conclusive. It is just as possible that it was originally written in Greek. Much earlier, J. J. Kneucker was satisfied that the entire book had originally been written in Hebrew, and he created his own retroversion of what he thought to be the original Hebrew.

Ultimately though, since one does not find ties between Ieremias and this second section of Barouch as is clearly the case with the first section, it is likely that it was the work of a different author who could easily have composed in Greek. All of the biblical citations found here are based on the LXX rather than on the Hebrew and therefore are suggestive of a Greek origin. It is just as likely that the author of this section of Barouch was trained in a Septuagintal style of writing and deliberately created an original Greek text in this manner. Perhaps by the time of Barouch's composition Hebraisms such as ei0j pe/nqoj (4.34) "to mourning" (Hebrew lb)^l, 2 Sam 19.3; Amos 8.10; Lam 5.15) were becoming commonplace in the Jewish tradition of biblical composition and therefore are nothing more than stylistic imitations of the Septuagint. Nevertheless, despite the apparent problems of determining the original language of composition for 3.9–5.9, since no Hebrew text for any part of Barouch has survived, NETS is based in its entirety solely on the Greek. That being the case, any attempt to create a translation profile for the book lacks credibility. Since the Hebrew "versions" we do have available are retroversions from the Greek and thus are based on assumed Hebrew-Greek equivalencies, using them as evidence is inherently problematic.

General Character of the Greek

There are subtle differences in the style or presentation of Greek between the two sections. Whereas the first section is replete with Hebraisms in the Greek, the second has far fewer. Nevertheless, since it attempts to imitate Hebrew poetry, the Greek is not altogether a fluid rendering.

Content

Barouch is a highly eclectic text. It reads like a patchwork of expressions and ideas borrowed from other parts of biblical material rather than an original work of its own. To give just a few examples, 1.15–2.12 shows considerable influence from Dan 9.7–14, and 2.13 compares well with Deut 28.62 and Jer 42.2. Barouch 3.29–4.4 is indebted to Job 28.12–27 as well as Deutero-Isaiah (e.g., 3.36 and 5.5, 7), Ecclesiast (Qoheleth) and the Psalms of Solomon for most of its ideas and expressions. Barouch 3.14 is reminiscent of Prov 3.13–18, and 4.15 is based on Deut 28.49–50. There are faint echoes of Reiqns as well. And, of course, the book of Jeremiah/Ieremias lies behind much of the content in the first section.

Barouch shows inconsistency in the use of divine titles. Though not problematic as Greek per se, such inconsistency might be indicative of multiple authors/translators and hence would constitute a way of noting different Greek usage. The first section (1.1–3.8) prefers ku/rioj to refer to the deity, whereas the first part of second section (3.9–4.4) commonly uses qeo/j . The second part of the second section (4.5–5.9) then introduces o9 ai0w&nioj “the everlasting one” as a preference. There is even the unique (to Barouch) and unexpected use of pantokra/twr “Almighty” as a divine epithet in 3.1, which almost suggests a different author/translator for the first eight verses of chapter three.

The appearance of very different basic words and phrases in the second section, not evident in the first, is both interesting and significant. In the previous prose section, the Greek kai/ (probably translating the Hebrew w) is very prominent, but in this poetic section de/ appears most often. As well, o3ti seems to be the translation of choice for the prose, but the translator prefers ga/r for the poetic material (both no doubt translating the Hebrew yk). Perhaps, all such “clues” to different translators/authors are merely due to a change in the content.

I owe an immeasurable debt to Albert Pietersma for his precedent-setting initial translation of the Psalms that has been the beacon for all subsequent NETS work. I wish to express a heartfelt, sincere gratitude for his personal encouragement and inexhaustible patience in advising on and editing this particular translation. There is clearly a debt here that can never be wholly repaid.

LAMENTATIONS

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The basis for the NETS translation of Lamentations is the critical edition of the Greek text established by Joseph Ziegler for the Göttingen Septuagint Series (J. Ziegler, Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Societatis Litterarum Göttingensis editum XV: Ieremias Baruch Threni Epistula Ieremiae [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1957]).

I have departed from the critical text of Ziegler in four instances. First are the alphabetic labels. The Hebrew book of Lamentations is comprised of five poems. The first four are alphabetic acrostics: each verse (or triplet of verses in the case of chapter 3) begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet.

While the fifth poem is not an acrostic per se, the number of lines (22) does correspond to the Hebrew alphabet. This acrostic structure is clearly represented not only in the Hebrew manuscript tradition by spacing techniques but also in the Greek (as well as in the Peshitta and Vulgate) tradition by including the Hebrew alphabet letters in Greek transcription as discrete labels heading each unit. Neither Alfred Rahlfs' Handausgabe (1935) nor Joseph Ziegler's critical edition recognizes these alphabetic labels as original text. Albert Pietersma has recently shown that they are indeed from the hand of the translator.¹ The alphabetic labels, therefore, are included in the NETS translation.

Second, neither the lemma of Rahlfs' or Ziegler's text includes 3.22-24 as original text. This is the entire x strophe. Since the endings of v. 21 and v. 24 are virtually identical (in both Hebrew and Greek), the omission might be blamed on an error of parablepsis due to homoioteleuton.

lyxw) Nk l(= dia\ tou=to u9pomenw~

wl lyxw) Nk l(= dia\ tou=to u9pomenw~ atuo/n (v. 24)

Pietersma has argued cogently, however, that the parablepsis occurred in the textual transmission of the Greek text and that the verses were part of the original translation.² The missing text may be gleaned from Ziegler's apparatus as follows:

ta\ e0le/h kuri/ou, o3ti ou0k e0celi/pomen, o3ti ou0 sunetele/sqhsan oi9 oi0ktirmoi\

au0tou=.kaina\ ei0j ta\j prwi/aj, pollh\ h9 pi/stij sou.

meri/j mou ku/rioj, ei]pen h9 yuxh/ mou:

dia\ tou=to u9pomenw~ atuo/n.

Third, neither Rahlfs' nor Zeigler's lemma have anything corresponding to 3.29. Certain witnesses in the textual transmission of the Septuagint do have the verse as follows: fin. Or. II 176] + (29) dwsei en xwmati (+ to 407) stoma autou ei ara estin elpij (+ upomonhj L' - 538 Tht. Ambr. Spec.) O-Qmg L'-538 87mg-91mg-239 Arm Tht. Ambr. V 204. 206 Spec.

The omission of the line was doubtless caused by parablepsis due to homoioarcton. While the omission might be blamed on either pre-Greek transmission or on the translator, since both vv. 29 and 30 begin with Nty, it is also possible that the parablepsis occurred in the textual transmission of the Greek.

Both Rahlfs and Ziegler no doubt thought the entire line hexaplaric and therefore secondary. Moreover, Ziegler boldly attributes the text to Symmachus, though no manuscript attributes it to one of the Three.

Indeed, support for the inference that the line is hexaplaric is weak. Text extant in Hebrew but not in Origen's Old Greek was added to his Fifth Column from one of the Three, usually Theodotion. Material in the Hexaplaric Text that clearly cannot be connected with the Three, as is the case here, is almost certainly Old Greek. Origen himself stated that for Lamentations, versions from Aquila and Theodotion were not extant, only those from the Septuagint and Symmachus (see Ziegler, p. 467). This statement, however, is 1 "The Acrostic Poems of Lamentations in Greek Translation," in VIII Congress of the IOSCS, Paris 1992 (SBLSCS 41; Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995) 183-201.

2 See Pietersma, "Acrostic Poems," 195-199.

to the reader of lamentations

only partially supported by evidence elsewhere: fragments attributed to Aquila are extant for Lamentations, but none attributed to Theodotion is found. Therefore one cannot on the basis of this statement automatically assign marginal materials lacking attribution to Symmachus. Ziegler's attempt to attribute 3.29 to Symmachus is not convincing; the translation technique may well fit Theodotion or Aquila but not the style of Symmachus. Note, for example, the rendering of $\rho\pi(\rho)$ by $xw\sim ma$. In 2.10b, the only other occurrence of $\rho\pi(\rho)$ in Lamentations, we have the similar term $xou=j$. This pattern is similar to Theodotion in Job ($\rho\pi(\rho) = xw\sim m1a4.8b, 19b; 17.16b; 19.25b; 20.11b; 22.24a; 28.6b; = xou=j 39.14b$), but uncharacteristic of Symmachus. Where Symmachus can be distinguished from Old Greek, Aquila and Theodotion, he has $xou=j$ only in Job 41.25, never $xw\sim ma$, and uses alternative equivalents $likkeo/nij$ in Job 5.6; 40.13; Ps 21(22).30; 29(30).10. An unanswered question is whether or not our Old Greek text of Lamentations is the work of Theodotion. Either Theodotion did not render or revise this book, or he did, and all evidence is now lost, or the Old Greek text we now have is from Theodotion. The external evidence for 3.29 does look suspiciously recensional, but interestingly, most of the support is from witnesses that have also preserved 3.22-24, although support is not as widespread. True, a full citation of 3.27-29 by Origen (Contra Celsum 7.25) does not have the line in question, but it is possible that the parablepsis occurred before Origen's time. The case is by no means as straightforward as that of 3.22-24 and external evidence weaker, but it is easier to imagine the mistake being made in the transmission of the Greek text than being made by the original translator. The text will be included, but enclosed within square brackets to indicate uncertainty.

Fourth is the case of 3.42. The editions of Rahlfs and Ziegler are as follows, including Apparatus I of Ziegler and the Masoretic Text:

txls)l ht) wnyrmw wn(#p wnxn [42]

This problem can best be resolved by careful consideration of translation technique. Clearly kai\ ou0x i9la/sqhj renders txls)l ht) or txls)l in the parent text. Less clear, however, are the original renderings of the first two predications. Leaving 3.42 aside for the moment, all instances of the verb)+x are rendered solely by a9marta/nw (1.8a; 5.7a, 16b).

The noun) + x occurs twice in the parent text and in both instances is translated by $\text{a}^9\text{marti/a}$ (1.8a; 3.39). The noun t) + x occurs three times in the Hebrew and is twice rendered by $\text{a}^0\text{nomi/a}$ (4.6a, 13a), once by $\text{a}^0\text{se/bhma}$ 4.22b. The verb (#p occurs only in 3.42, but the noun is found three times in the parent text and is rendered by $\text{a}^0\text{se/beia}$ in 1.5b, by $\text{a}^0\text{se/bhma}$ in 1.14a and by $\text{a}^9\text{ma/rthma}$ in 1.22b. The parent text has three instances of the verb hrm and all are rendered by parapikrai/nw (1.18a, 20b bis). In addition, the adjective rm is translated by pikrai/nw in 1.4c and the noun rrm by pikri/a in 3.15. pikri/a also renders Hebrew hn(l in 3.20[19 MT], but xolh/ is employed for the other instance of this word in 3.15. To complete the picture, note that the noun Nw(is rendered by $\text{a}^0\text{nomi/a}$ three times, (4.6a, 22a, 22b), by $\text{a}^0\text{no/mhma}$ once (5.7b) and by $\text{a}^0\text{diki/a}$ twice (2.14b; 4.13a). While the Greek translator of Lamentations is not absolutely rigid in his equivalents for Hebrew terms for “sin,” the degree of stereotyping is high. Normally words from the $\text{a}^9\text{mart-}$ root are employed for words in Hebrew from) + x , words from (#p are rendered by lexemes from the $\text{a}^0\text{seb-}$ root, and Nw(is rendered by $\text{a}^0\text{nomi/a}$ and $\text{a}^0\text{diki/a}$. The translator tries to distinguish the nouns) + x and t) + x by employing $\text{a}^9\text{marti/a}$ for the former and $\text{a}^0\text{nomi/a}$ for the latter. The use of $\text{a}^0\text{nomi/a}$ in 4.22a for Nw(is what motivates the use of $\text{a}^0\text{se/bhma}$ as an alternative for t) + x in 4.22b. The rendering of lexemes from rrm by words from the pikr- root is stereotypical.

If Rahlfs is right, (#p would be rendered by $\text{a}^9\text{marta/nw}$ and hrm by $\text{a}^0\text{sebe/w}$, uniquely in both cases.

Neither is likely in terms of translation technique. Ziegler is an advance on Rahlfs, since he correctly includes $\text{kai\ parepikra/namen}$, omitted due to parablepsis. Ziegler is also aware that 3.42 is a confession of sin that is somewhat typical in the Old Testament and attributes variants largely in the L group (Lucianic recension) to the influence of parallel passages. Unfortunately, he did not pursue this tack far enough. Almost certainly, $\alpha\theta\sigma\epsilon\beta\eta/\sigma\alpha\mu\epsilon\eta\iota\varsigma$ is the rendering of the Greek translator for $\omega\kappa(\#\rho$ and $\eta\theta\mu\alpha\rho\theta/\sigma\alpha\mu\epsilon\eta\iota\varsigma$ is due to harmonization from parallel passages along with the loss of $\kappa\alpha\iota$ \ parepikra/namen through parablepsis.

There is also no good reason to exclude the pronouns $\eta\theta\mu\epsilon\iota=j$ and $\sigma\upsilon/$ as hexaplaric just because they are in the Hexaplaric Group and equal MT. First, there is no textual testimony to indicate that they were introduced from the Three. Second, in terms of translation technique, the independent first and second person pronouns are always rendered by pronouns in Greek elsewhere by the Greek translator (yn) = e0gw& 1.16a[15cMT], 21a; 3:1, 63; wnxn) = h9mei=j 5.7b; ht) = su/ 1.21b; 5.19a), and the third person pronouns are usually so ()wh by au0to/j in 3.10, by e0sti/n in 1.18a;)yh by au0th/ in 1.4c, 8c and zero in 1.3b; hmh by au0toi/ in 1.19a). It is therefore out of character for the Greek translator not to render wnxn and ht) in 3.42. Thus, we consider the following to be the original text: 9Hmei=j h0sebh/samen kai\ parepikra/namen, kai\ su/ ou0x i9la/sqhj.

to the reader of lamentations

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

Greek Lamentations is chiefly characterized by formal equivalence to the source language, i.e., Hebrew.

More particularly, it belongs to a group of both translations and revisions known as the kai/ge tradition, due to its standard rendering of Mg/Mgw by kai/ge. D. Barthélemy first identified the tradition in his Les Devanciers d'Aquila (1963).³ He delineated nine key chief characteristics of members of the tradition. The chart below lists the traits and marks their presence (P) or inapplicability (NA) in the case of Greek Lamentations.

1. Mg/Mgw = kai/ge

2. $#y) = a_0nh/r$

Brief comments on patterns present in the Greek Lamentations are necessary.

1) kai/ge for Mg (Mgw does not occur) is well attested: 1.8c; 2.9c; 3.8; 4.3a, 15b, 21b.

2) a0nh/r for #y) appears in 3.33, but not as a distributive.

3) bcn is rendered twice. In 2.4a wnymy bcn is translated e0stere/wse decia\n au0tou=. Thus the equivalent is stereo/w, and the Hebrew parent text appears to be read as Hiphil rather than Niphal.⁴ In 3.12 ynbycyw is rendered by kai\ e0sth/lwse/ me and is therefore true to pattern.

4) Since in only one instance (4.19a = MT 18b) does a Greek present appear, it can safely be said that the translator was not in the habit of using historical presents.

5) The pseudo-verbal Ny) is glossed six times as ou0k e1stin (1.9b, 17a, 21a; 2.9b; 4.4b; 5.8b), once as ou0k h]n (1.7c), and three times as ou0k u9pa/rxei/u9pa/rxousin (1.2b; 5.3a, 7a). Once Ny)m is rendered by tou= mh\ ei]nai (3.49). 1.21a is not in a succession of aorists and can be eliminated.

In sum, only three of the five patterns provide strong support that the Greek Lamentations belongs to the kai/ge tradition.

Other scholars have proposed patterns additional to these nine, but they are not as crucial or significant.⁵ It is clear that some relationship exists between Greek Lamentations and other texts in the kai/ge tradition, but it is not systematic.⁶

For the purposes of NETS it is useful to note that the approach of the translator to his task is one where faithfulness is defined and measured by a degree of quantitative alignment between Greek translation and Hebrew original. The Greek translation of Ruth is similar.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF LAMENTATIONS

In accordance with NETS policy this translation makes an attempt at reflecting the style of the Greek.

Though ungrammatical English has been avoided, less than felicitous English may be expected. Formal equivalence is frequently given higher priority than idiomatic English.

The attempt to follow a model of translation similar to that of the Greek translator has occasionally created clashes with the NRSV. For example, in 3.33 NRSV has a free and idiomatic rendering of the Hebrew text: “for he does not willingly afflict or grieve anyone.” Greek Lamentations renders the same Hebrew in extreme literalism. Some differences between NETS and NRSV are due to the fact that the Greek translator interprets the Hebrew differently; others reflect a difference in translational approach between the two.

On occasion the gender inclusive language policy of NRSV had to be abandoned in order to reflect the Greek adequately. For example, according to the approach of the Greek translator, $\mu\delta$ is rendered by $\alpha\lambda\eta\eta\tau\eta\varsigma$ (3.36, 39) and $\#y$ by $\alpha\theta\eta\eta$ (3.33). This enables the Greek reader to track the differences between the two words in the parent text. In NETS, while gender inclusive renderings may be maintained for $\alpha\lambda\eta\eta\tau\eta\varsigma$, $\alpha\theta\eta\eta$ is gender specific in Greek and is translated accordingly in English. There are also instances where gender inclusive language has been achieved by converting generic masculine singular pronouns and verbs to common gender plural pronouns and verbs or by altering active constructions to passive. Sometimes this so alters the formal equivalence between NRSV and the Hebrew that the formal equivalence between the Greek and the Hebrew cannot be fairly represented this way. 3.35 and 36 may illustrate the attempt in NETS to represent the exact way in which the Greek reproduces the Hebrew text.

EDITORIAL POLICY

While the Greek translator does not always read the beginning and ending of sentences or connections between clauses in the Hebrew in the same way as NRSV, in essence the same versification is used. Differences can be indicated by different grammar and punctuation.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

NETS is for the most part a completely fresh translation of the Greek adapted to NRSV. Occasionally, the translation of Brenton was consulted and found to be useful. The doctoral dissertation of I. Assan-Dhote⁷ was graciously sent to me by the author, but unfortunately not until the Fall of 2000 when all research for the NETS Lamentations was virtually complete. It is interesting to note that she connects the Greek Lamentations with Theodotion, but her analysis of translation technique is not exhaustive.

LETTER OF IEREMIAS

TO THE READER

EDITION OF GREEK TEXT

The New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of the Letter of Ieremias (Jeremiah) is based on the critical edition of Joseph Ziegler (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Societatis Litterarum Göttingensis editum XV: Ieremias Baruch Threni Epistula Ieremiae [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1957]). The verse numbering follows that of the critical text.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

Translation from Hebrew?

Although in the Septuagint the Letter of Ieremias (Letler) is a discrete unit, in the Vulgate it forms chapter 6 of the book of Barouch. Many scholars are convinced that, even though no Semitic Vorlage for the Greek text is extant, it is indeed a translation. A number of features of the book are more typical of original Greek composition, however. Carey Moore identifies “three lines of linguistic evidence” that he considers probative for concluding that the Letter originated as a translation.¹ First, a number of Greek readings seem to stem from misreadings of a Hebrew parent text. So, for example: (1) In v. 11 the Greek claims that the idols of the Gentiles cannot save themselves from “rust and foods (brwma/twn).” The “translator” has apparently confused two possible pointings of lk)m—one meaning “from a devour-er” (so, for example, in Mal 3.11 a consuming insect, locust or moth) and one meaning food;² (2) gnw&rimoi in v. 14 represents a mistake on the part of the “translator,” who evidently read My(dwm as a noun rather than a participle;³ and (3) in v. 71 the translator produced “from the purple and marble (marma/rou) that rots upon them.” Of course, marble does not rot, and here we see a confusion of the Hebrew word for “alabaster” or “marble,” ##, with its homograph, which means “fine linen.”⁴ Second, a Semitic original seems the best explanation for the existence of some variant readings. So, for instance, in v. 54, the Greek reads, “like crows (korw~nai) between heaven and earth,” for which the Syriac has “ravens.” The inherent difficulty of the verse and the Syriac’s “ravens” together suggest that the Greek “translator” may have read a Hebrew Myb(k, “as the clouds,” as Mybr(k, “as the crows.”⁵ Third, Moore notes the presence of what he identifies as “Hebraisms,” such as the use of the Greek future tense as a present tense and what looks like the rendering of the Hebrew infinitive absolute in v. 4—mh\ kai\ u(meij a0fomoiwqe/ntej toi=j a)llofu/loij a0fomoiwqh=te, “lest you too, having been made like the allophytes, become like them.”⁶ One last bit of evidence that we have in Letler is that in v. 69 the Greek has, “For like a scarecrow in a cucumber patch,” a phrase that occurs in the Hebrew of Jer 10.5, but not in the Greek, which indicates that the author of the Letter drew on the Hebrew of Jeremiah, and the Greek translator rendered what he had before him.

Each of these “lines of linguistic evidence”—misreadings, variant readings, and Hebraisms—are characteristic of the translation process, and they could point to the genesis of Letler as a translation. At least two of Moore’s examples are somewhat weak, however. First, the use of gnw&rimoi in v. 14 might not be a misreading at all, since the Greek word can just as well be an adjective as a noun. Second, two obstacles stand in the way of understanding the phrase a0fomoiwqe/ntej toi=j a)llofu/loij a0fomoiwqh=te as reflecting an infinitive absolute in a presumed Hebrew Vorlage. Both the existence of paranomasia in the Greek and the interposition of toi=j a)llofu/loij between the participle and the verb, since the infinitive absolute in Hebrew keeps the two verbal forms immediately adjacent to one another, mitigate the force of this interpretation.

Composition in Greek?

Whereas Letter undeniably contains elements indicative of translation, other features of this work are not typical of the kind of Greek normally seen in the Septuagint. One of the most frequently occurring is the use of Greek particles. Letter often uses as connectors particles that require second position in the clause—a feature not found in Hebrew grammar. The numbers are really quite staggering for a book of a scant 72 verses: ou 12 x; ga/r, 16 x; de/, 23 x; te (counting its use as a coordinator of all types, including the negative ou3te) 33 x. Some entire books of the Septuagint do not contain 23 occurrences of de/. The appearance of these particles might suggest that the Greek writer was interested in the logical connection of one clause to another, but that is by no means apparent in the frequency with which these words appear.

In fact, their logical force is almost blunted by how many times they appear sequentially in one clause after the other.

Finally, there are a number of places where the Greek text really makes little sense, or, at least, one has to work very hard to wrest some sense from it. In other books of the Septuagint, scholars often understand such difficult passages as indicating the translator's inability to make sense of the Hebrew Vorlage.

Perhaps the best example of such a case in Letler is vv. 40–41. In these two verses, one is often at a loss to know what the writer is trying to communicate. In v. 40 the claim is made that the Chaldeans dishonor their gods. The Greek as we have it, however, really does not satisfactorily say how they do this. They encounter and then bring a mute person to Bel—but then the uncertainty really begins. The third clause of the verse, because the object is not explicit, is not clear as to whether the Chaldeans expect the mute person to speak or whether it is their god Bel who should talk. In v. 41, the Greek grammar suggests that the Chaldeans, even though they understand that their gods cannot speak or make the mute speak, cannot abandon their gods and thus are as senseless as they. How, one wonders, does their inability to leave their gods dishonor them? Perhaps this logical difficulty is what prompts both the NRSV and Moore to render the text so that, contrary to the Greek, the Chaldeans do not perceive and thus they actually do abandon their gods—precisely the opposite of what the Greek grammar would lead one to think. Moore's and the NRSV's English translations at least bring a logical consistency to the passage and the actions could thus be understood as dishonoring the idols.

One approach to this conundrum would be to conclude that the difficulty reflects a translator who did not understand the full import of a Hebrew parent text or who got lost in a difficult Hebrew sentence, and as a result he made something of a mess out of these verses. A possible way to check or confirm this explanation might be to reconstruct a possible Hebrew Vorlage for these verses. Although any attempt at retroversion from Greek into Hebrew ought to be undertaken with caution, these verses do not retrovert into Hebrew very readily at all. Indeed, the complexity of the verses really looks more like an overworked stab at Greek rhetorical style than a translation.

Inconclusive Evidence

So, Letler presents us with a confusing situation. On the one hand, several features of this text could be the result of the process of translating from Hebrew to Greek. On the other hand, the relatively frequent appearance of elements of compositional style and certain normal features of Greek, such as the extensive use of particles and the occurrence of verbal adjectives ending in -teoj (for which there is no Hebrew equivalent) indicate that the writer is working at the least at the discourse level (and perhaps originally in Greek). When one surveys the entire work, there is a notable absence of telltale signs of the different translational styles that one finds elsewhere in the Jewish-Greek corpus. Further study of this problem in Letler seems necessary and would benefit from an analysis of the letter's Greek style, which seems a desideratum for the work. At best, then, we can conclude that the evidence for Letler being a translation is inconclusive at this juncture.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF THE LETTER

Since Letler does display at least some evidence of being a translation, I have taken a practical approach and followed all of the usual NETS guidelines for a translated text. In those cases where the Greek could be a misreading of a missing Semitic parent, I have retained the "misreading." So, for example, even though marble does not rot, that is what the Greek writer produced and that is the text I have translated.

In several cases where the Greek is awkward or even close to nonsensical, I have retained that flavor in NETS, while maintaining grammatical English. As a result, the NETS translation varies from the NRSV

(and Moore's translation incidentally) at quite a number of places, since the NRSV assumes that the Letter is a self-standing Greek text that should be comprehensible on its own. NETS does not make such assumptions.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS version of Iezekiel (Ezekiel) follows the Greek edition by Joseph Ziegler Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum XVI.1: Ezekiel (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977) in all points with the exception of some matters of punctuation and sentence divisions.

With the MT as the point of comparison, the LXX text features numerous omissions as well as some additions. Larger omissions occur in chaps. 32 and 33, where all of 32.19; and 33.26 are absent from the Septuagint text, and the larger part of 32.23, 25, 31; 33.25 and 27 are lacking. Larger plusses occur in Iezek 40.6–8 and 43 and 44. The reader will also note a shuffling in the order of verses at the beginning of chap. 7.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

The Greek translators follow an isomorphic model of translation quite closely, preferring to employ a Greek item to represent each Hebrew item. But within this approach, (explained as the interlinear model; see "TO THE READER OF NETS"), the Greek translators employ relative freedom in the choice of the exact terms used in various contexts. The translation shows both semantic leveling, as one Greek term can be used to represent several Hebrew terms, but it also shows a great deal of semantic differentiation, as many Greek terms can be used to render one Hebrew term. To cite a particularly clear example of semantic differentiation, the single Hebrew term "sword" (brx) is translated by four different Greek terms: "sword" (r9omfai/a), "dagger" (ma/xaira), "hand-knife" (e0gxeiri/dion) and "rapier" (ci/foj). The first two terms alternate as the most common translation of brx depending on the political context of the prophecies, while the latter two terms occur only five times overall, being reserved for specific contexts. In chaps. 5-24 where the prophecies concern Israel, the standard translation is "sword" (r9omfai/a), occurring 34 x, whereas "dagger" (ma/xaira) only occurs twice in these same chapters. The relative frequency inverts in chaps. 25-32 where the focus of the prophecies shifts to other nations. There "dagger"

(ma/xaira) occurs 27 x compared to only 7 for "sword" (r9omfai/a). Then in chap. 33 the situation inverts again as the focus of the prophecies shifts back to Israel and "sword" (r9omfai/a) occurs 5 x compared to one for "dagger" (ma/xaira). In yet another reversal the prophecies concerning Gog and Magog in chaps.

38 and 39 “dagger” (ma/xaira) occurs four times as the exclusive translation for brx. “Hand-knife”

(e0gxeiri/dion) occurs only three times, in 21.3, 4 and 5, where it describes the Lord’s own weapon, and “rapier” (ci/foj) occurs only in 16.40 and 23.47, in both contexts describing a lover’s sword used to slay a prostitute.

The choice of terms in many cases possibly reflects changes made according to political contexts, since terms seem to vary based upon the nation being discussed, be it Israel, Egypt, Idumea (Edom), Tyre, Sidon or others. While it is possible that the translators were trying to be sensitive to political nuances, another explanation would be that different translators handled different materials and therefore word choices reflect the individual preferences of separate translators.

So for example, the terms for political leaders show both semantic leveling and differentiation that generally correspond to political contexts. The translators seem to avoid using royal language to describe the rulers of Israel, even when the Hebrew employs royal language to describe them. Instead, to describe the leaders in Israel the translators use the rather generic terms “leader/guide” (a0fhgou/menouj) and “guide/leader” (h9gou/menouj) or “ruler” (a1rxwn). So even when the Hebrew uses the term “king” (Klm) three times to describe the kings of Israel in 43.7 and 9, the Greek translators use the term “guide/leader”

(h9gou/menouj). Elsewhere, the translators regularly use the royal term “king” (basileu/j) to translate Klm, but in those contexts it does not describe the kings of Israel but rather the kings of Babylon (17.12 and 16 and elsewhere), of the earth (27.33), of the islands (27.35), of Egypt (29.2; 30.10 and elsewhere). The only king of Israel or Judah who bears the title “king” (basileu/j) is loakim in 1.2. Even Daud is not described as “king” (basileu/j) in 37.24 but rather as “ruler” (a1rxwn), even though the Hebrew reads to the reader of iezekiel “king” (Klm). Likewise, the term)y#n, which the NRSV translates as “prince” when referring to princes in Israel, is rendered with the terms “ruler” (a1rxwn), “leader/guide” (a0fhgou/menouj) and “guide/leader”

(h9gou/menouj) (see 12.12; 46.2; 45.7).

The translators also (possibly) show variations in their choice of terms to describe the destruction of different political entities, including cities and countries. So they translate the term “desolation” (hmm#) as “annihilation” (a0fanismo/j), i.e., devastation to the point of complete disappearance, when describing the destruction of Israel in chaps. 6–23. But when describing the “desolation” (hmm#) of Egypt in chap.

29, the Greek has the term “destruction/ruin” (a0pw&leia), and then “desolation” (e0rhmi/a or e1rhmoj) when describing Mount Seir in chap. 35, which implies that the land is emptied but still exists. So

“wilderness” (e1rhmoj) translates the term “wilderness” (rbdm) in chaps. 6–20, when the discussion concerns Israel; then it translates “ruins” (hbrx) in chaps. 25–30 when the discussion switches to Edom, Tyre and Egypt. In chaps. 33–35 where the discussion concerns the mountains of Seir and Israel, “wilderness” (e1rhmoj) translates “desolation” (hmm#). Then in chaps. 36 and 38, which promise the restoration of the ruined areas in Israel, “wilderness” (e1rhmoj) once again translates “ruins” (hbrx). Other words for destruction in both noun and verb forms show similar patterns of differentiation.

As a final set of examples of possible political contextualization, the terms regarding sin show a high degree of differentiation in various political contexts, although not as consistently as the terms for rulers or even the terms for destruction. So the term “misdeed” (Nw()) is rendered as “injustice” (a0diki/a) in chaps. 3–24, regarding the sin of Israel. An exception occurs in 16.49, in the long comparison of Israel to a prostitute where “misdeed” (Nw()) is translated as “lawless act” (a0no/mhma). But the same term “misdeed” (Nw()) is rendered as “sin” (a9marti/a) regarding the ruler of Tyre in 28.18 and as “lawlessness”

(a0nomi/a) regarding the misdeeds of Egypt, Mosoch (Meshech) and Thobel (Tubal) in 29.16 and 32.27.

Then, in chaps. 33–44, where the discussion reverts to Israel, “misdeed” (Nw()) is translated by four different terms, “lawlessness” (a0nomi/a), “impiety” (a0se/beia), “sin” (a9marti/a) and “injustice” (a0diki/a) in 33.8; 33.9; 39.23 and 44.10, respectively.

The variation of terms found in the Greek translation does not concern only political contexts but is reflected in many other terms as well. For example, the term “spirit” or “wind” (xwr) is translated by six different Greek terms: “wind” (a1nemoj), “spirit/wind” (pneu=ma), “blast/breath” (pnoh/), “fervor” (qumo/j), “face” (pro/swpon) and “part” (me/roj), depending on the precise linguistic context.

As a result of the nuancing of their terms, the translators produce a Greek text that is, for the most part, quite understandable, although their excessive literalism can present problems for the reader of the Greek text. Very problematic is the lack of nuance shown in rendering the Hebrew word Ntn “give,” which can also mean “to set,” “establish,” “appoint” or “turn into.” But despite the variations of the Hebrew meanings, the translators almost always render it with di/dwmi “give,” which does not have the same extended range of meanings as does Hebrew Ntn, with the result that many turns of phrase must have sounded odd to a Greek ear.

Also problematic is the literal translation of the Hebrew oath formula, as exemplified in 16.48: “I live, says the Lord, if your sister Sodoma has acted, she and her daughters, as you and your daughters acted! . . .” What follows the “if” clause is left unspoken, so the reader is left with an unresolved conditional clause and a sentence fragment.

THE NETS TRANSLATION

There are two ways to depart from a literal one-for-one correspondence of Greek terms for Hebrew terms. Either several Greek terms can be used to translate a single Hebrew term or a single Greek term can be used for several Hebrew terms. Both are commonplace in the Greek translation of Iezekiel in a way that cannot be characterized as either pure semantic leveling or as pure semantic nuancing, because one-for-many and many-for-one substitutions occur for the same terms. So, for example, the Greek term “stretch out” (e0ktei/nw) translates five different Hebrew terms: drp (1.11); r#y (1.23); xl# (2.9); h+n (1.22); and Mrq (37.6). Taken by itself it would appear to be a case of semantic leveling. But if one looks at xl#, one of the Hebrew terms translated by e0ktei/nw, xl# is itself translated by five distinct Greek terms: e0caposte/l w (3.6); a0poste/l w (7.3); e0ktei/nw (8.3); e0paposte/l w (14.19); yilo/w (44.20). As a result, it is impossible to assert that the translators were leveling the translations for the term xl# and related terms. There is an interlocking pattern of both one-for-many and many-for-one substitutions.

As a result where there is a pattern of one-for-one translations for terms, NETS also follows a straight one-for-one substitution following the NRSV, as much as possible. But where there is a many-for-one pattern interwoven with a one-for-many pattern, NETS varies the terms that are used for the Greek terms, as much as possible. Each Greek-for-Hebrew translation couplet is represented by distinct English terms. So to the reader of iezekiel

when e0ktei/nw translates xl#, it is represented in NETS by “extend,” but when it translates h+n, it is represented by “stretch out,” since e0ktei/nw is being used in two different ways. Likewise, when xl# is translated by e0caposte/l w, NETS uses “send,” whereas when xl# is translated by e0ktei/nw, again NETS uses “extend,” because two different terms are being used to translate a single Greek term. Since the translations display neither pure leveling nor nuancing, the departures from literal one-for-one substitutions are both marked by a variation of the terms in NETS.

As for the exceptional one-for-one literalism in the use of di/dwmi for Ntn, NETS seeks to represent the problem by rendering “give” (di/dwmi) with synonyms for “give,” even when they produce a somewhat forced translation, to try to represent the literalism of the Greek translation with regard to the term.

Finally, there are numerous cases of disagreement between subject and verb of the sentence, where a plural noun disagrees with a singular verb. In these cases, the offending noun and pronoun or verb are rendered as they are in Greek to indicate a disruption of the normal pattern of grammatical agreement.

For example 3.7 reads: “But the house of Israel shall not be willing to listen to you, for they do not wish to listen to me, because all the house of Israel are contentious and hard-hearted.” The singular “house of Israel” does not agree with the plural forms of the verb in the next clauses, resulting in a lack of agreement in the NETS translation.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

I would like to thank Albert Pietersma for all his insightful comments regarding the translation of Iezekiel, Benjamin Wright for his efforts to organize the project and keep it on track, and Matt Olsen and my wife, Meredyth Hubler, for their patient proofreading. Good use has been made of the standard grammars and lexica.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation for the two versions has been based on the critical editions of Joseph Ziegler and Olivier Munnich (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum XVI.2: Susanna Daniel Bel et Draco [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999]). Munnich has revised Ziegler's critical edition of the Old Greek (OG) version (1954), because Ziegler did not have access to several important portions of papyrus 967. Accordingly, the NETS translation of the OG has been based on Munnich, while Theodotion (TH) has been translated from Ziegler.

THE TWO GREEK VERSIONS

Sousanna, like some other books, has a special place in the Septuagint because there are extant in Greek two complete ancient versions: the Old Greek (OG) and Theodotion (TH). Since these are two versions of one story, a very brief introduction and comparison is in order.

Although the nucleus of the story is the same, OG is significantly shorter than TH. The omission of some of the details gives a faster pace to the OG version. The opening four verses of TH are absent from OG, as are 15-18, 20-21, 24-27 (details on the attempted rape of Sousanna), 42-43, 46-47, 49-50

(Daniel's involvement in uncovering the elders' deception), though OG tells the story somewhat differently. Also OG and TH have distinct endings. TH concludes with Daniel's rise to fame whereas OG ends with a self-admonition to look out for able sons. As a result of these differences Daniel is more prominent in TH than he is in OG, possibly because in TH Sousanna serves as an introduction to Daniel while in OG it appears as the final chapter (13).

While there are considerable differences between the OG and TH, they also have identical wording for all or most of a verse ten times (vv. 5, 9, 22-23, 34, 40-41, 52, 57-58). In a further eleven verses they have large or distinctive agreements in wording (7, 10, 29, 32, 33, 48, 51, 53, 55, 61, 62). It appears that Sousanna was revised and enlarged in its Semitic form in order to enhance the role of Daniel. As noted, in TH Sousanna precedes Daniel.

It appears likely that OG and TH derive from the same source text, but also that they are related at the level of the Greek.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

General Character

Any detailed description of the translation of Sousanna is hampered by the absence of an extant Hebrew or Aramaic source. Sousanna is brief, sixty-four verses in TH and c. forty-six in OG. Both versions may, however, be characterized as formal correspondence type of translations, meaning that the vocabulary and syntactic structure of the Greek are heavily determined by the presumed Semitic source texts. The nature of this dependence fits the paradigm of interlinear translations, though the OG exhibits more freedom with respect to its source than does TH. Though in the absence of an extant Semitic source uncertainty remains, there are several features of Sousanna that suggest a translation. The frequent appearance of kai “and” points to conjunctive w in the source text, as in other translated books. In TH the phrase kai e)ge/neto “and it happened” for the Semitic yhyw also occurs four times (vv. 7, 15, 19, 28). Though this idiom does not appear in OG, both versions do have i0dou “lo” (TH vv. 20, 43; OG vv. 13, 44). Though this typically reflects ynh in the LXX, admittedly it is not un-Greek. The phrase stena/ moi pa/ntoqen “Things are narrow for me on all sides” in TH v. 22 is almost certainly a Semitic idiom (cf. 2 Rgns 24.14), and there are a couple of instances where the definite article signals the vocative (v. 42[TH] and v. 48).

In some instances the two versions are very similar in content and grammar, but they employ different vocabulary. These cases are best explained as translations of the same Semitic text by the two translators. For example, TH v. 23 has ai9reto/n moi/ e0sti “It is preferable for me,” while OG reads ka/l ion de/ me

“But it would be better for me.” Other such instances can be found in vv. 53 and 54.

Though both versions are generally literal, the OG is the freer of the two (see above), an example being

OG's more frequent use of adverbial participles where the source text would have finite verbs. Although it is not impossible that OG's shorter scope is in part attributable to its translator, it might just as well be due to a shorter original. As noted above, expansion might have occurred to enhance the role of Daniel.

Though OG is the shorter version, it contains many phrases and clauses not found in TH, and usually these contain adverbial participles (e.g., vv. 28 and 29).

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF SOUSANNA

General Approach

Since both versions are fairly literal and are therefore often written in translationese, NETS has attempted to mimic their close linguistic relationship to the source. As a result, compared to the NRSV, NETS will at times appear stilted and awkward. So, the parataxis of the Greek is typically retained in NETS, and standardized vocabulary is meant to suggest source-target equivalence. At the same time, variety in the Greek is typically reflected in NETS, whether within or between the two versions.

The Two Translations

One of the most challenging aspects of translating the two Greek versions into English has been to provide renderings that clarify both where the two versions are the same and where they are not. Thus, where the identical terms occur in both Greek version, identical terms have been used in NETS, even if these appear in different locations. For example, οἱ ἐπινοῶντες πάντα τὰ πρὶν γενέσθαι τὰ πάντα “You who know all things before their beginning” appears in OG 35a and in TH 42. In cases where TH and OG vary only slightly, alternative vocabulary choices in English were readily available (see e.g., vv. 14, 48, 53). In short, every effort has been made to reflect sameness and difference, in vocabulary and grammar, between the two Greek versions.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

Since TH is the basis for the NRSV translation of Sousanna, the versification of NRSV and NETS TH correspond, which in turn agrees with Rahlfs and Ziegler. For the OG I have followed Ziegler/Munnich, which differs only slightly from Rahlfs.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

In addition to the standard reference tools I was most appreciative of the translation and commentary on Susanna by Carey A. TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translations of the two versions of Daniel have effectively been based on the critical editions by Joseph Ziegler and Olivier Munnich (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum XVI.2: Susanna Daniel Bel et Draco [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999]). Munnich, however, has revised Ziegler's edition of the Old Greek (OG), based on additional textual evidence from Papyrus 967, the most important manuscript for the OG, but he has reprinted Ziegler's text of Theodotion (TH). In a few cases I have emended Munnich's text. Instances that result in changes in (English) translation appear in the footnotes, while items judged to be doublets and therefore of dubious originality are enclosed in brackets in accordance with Göttingen and NETS practice.

THE TWO GREEK VERSIONS

General Statement

The Book of Daniel with its so-called Additions has a special place in the Septuagint because, along with a few other books, it is extant in two complete, ancient versions. The (earlier) OG translation, of which few witnesses remain, had been supplanted by the TH version by the first or second century CE. A brief introduction to both, and some discussion about their relationship, will be offered. The first six chapters are comprised of narratives about Daniel and his three friends in the courts of Babylonia. The last six chapters are reports of Daniel's apocalyptic visions, written in the first person. A precise statement on the relationship between the OG and TH translations is complicated by the fact that they do not reflect the same relationship consistently. Furthermore, one's conclusions have to be tempered by the available evidence. The best place to begin is chapters 4-6 where the differences are most numerous.

Chapters 4-6

The plot in Daniel 4-6 is the same, respectively, in the OG and TH/MT, but there are numerous differences in details. For example, chapter 4 in the OG narrates the story of Nabouchodonosor's (Nebu-chadnezzar's) madness, but his confession and the publication of his decree occur in a much expanded form at the end of the chapter in vv. 34-34c rather than at the beginning. Relative to TH/MT there are other pluses to vv. 14, 19, 23-25, 28, 30 as well as significant minuses that comprise vv. 20-22. Moreover, there is no equivalent to 4.3-6. Chapter 5 recounts the mysterious writing on the wall, but the OG includes an abbreviated form of the story as a preface and omits significant portions of vv. 3, 10-13. Lacking too is any counterpart to vv. 14-15, 18-22 and 24-25. Chapter 6, in which Daniel is thrown into the lion's den, is much closer in length in the respective versions. Yet there are large pluses in the OG (vv. 3, 5, 12a, 14, 17-18, 22) and minuses (vv. 15, 23). But even where pluses and minuses are lacking, in these chapters the Greek versions show little relationship in style, grammar and, more importantly, vocabulary.

A detailed comparison of the Greek texts in Daniel 4-6 reveals that less than 19% of any of the vocabulary of TH agrees with the OG. However, when the vocabulary is similar, about 83% of it is exact.

Agreements are so few that it is clear that TH is not a revision of the OG in these chapters. At the same time, given the high percentage of verbatim agreements despite the low frequency of shared readings overall, the only reasonable explanation is that the majority of these agreements are due to textual corruption of the OG with TH readings. Indeed, numerous passages can be isolated where there are double translations in the OG that include the reading of TH.

Chapters 1-3

The relationship between the OG and TH is different in chapters 1-3. Although in a few places the OG has larger omissions (e.g., 2.40, 42; 3.3, 15) or additions (2.9; 3.1) relative to TH/MT, the texts are generally much closer in content. The closer relationship between the content of the chapters is reflected in the vocabulary as well, though the number of agreements is still relatively low. When proper nouns are excluded, the vocabulary of the OG and TH is similar about 38% of the time. The highest incidence of

to the reader of daniel agreement is in chapter 3 where it is about 44%. Throughout most of chapters 1 - 2 and for portions of chapter 3, it is clear that the translation of TH is distinct from the OG. In many passages that contain agreements, they can be demonstrated to be due to corrections and corruptions of the OG from the text of TH. This is consistent with the evidence in chapters 4 - 6. It is only in chapter 3 that there is a higher degree of agreement between the texts. It would seem unlikely, however, that one chapter out of the first six would be a revision. Therefore, rather than speaking of "revision" in these chapters, one might better label OG and TH independent translations. Agreements are either incidental—since both versions are translating a similar source—or they are textual corruptions in the OG under the influence of TH.

Chapters 7-12

It is not until chapters 7-12 that one generally finds the common vocabulary in the two Greek versions to run around 50% and portions (e.g., 7.10, 25; 8.11-17, 21-23; 9.3-4, 11-12, 19-20, 27; 10.3-6, 19-20; 11.38) where there is extensive agreement for a verse or more. Some of the places where there is agreement can be demonstrated to be due to textual corruption, while others are incidental agreements that would be expected from two independent translators working from a similar source text. However, the portions of the Greek versions in these chapters where the verbal agreements between the texts are strong give the appearance that the TH text is a revision of the OG.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

General Character

Though differences in translational approach among Septuagint translators are not difficult to find, there is little doubt that TH is characterized by formal equivalence to its source, while the OG is more dynamic. Hard and fast distinctions between them, however, are difficult to document, as indicated by the use of kai/ “and” for Hebrew w. Though the OG employs de/ just over 50 times, compared to only 7 in TH, most often the default equivalent for both is kai/. Another problem in this regard is the nature of the OG translation. In chapters 4-6 the source text underlying the OG seems to be very different from the MT, as a result of which the OG is quite different from TH. On the other hand, in chapters 7-12 the OG seems to be based on a source text very similar to the MT. Consequently, it is much easier to compare their approaches in the later chapters, though the style of the OG does appear to differ in the earlier chapters. Examples of stereotyped equivalents in TH are ginw&skw (“to know”) = (dy, gnwri/zw (“to make known”) = (dy (Aramaic), di/dwmi (“to give”) = Ntn, e1rxomai (“to go”) + cognates =)t),)wb, lale/w (“to speak”) = rbd and suntele/w (“to finish”) = hlk. The TH version is not slavishly literal, however. Although it employs stereotyped equivalents in many cases, there are instances where alternative renderings are chosen. For example, grafh/ (“writing”) or its cognate verb renders every instance of btk (“writing”) except 6.10 where do/gma (“decree”) is used. In other cases TH has many equivalents for the one Hebrew word.

For example, zw(m (“strength”) is rendered by i)sxu/j (“strength”), u(posth/rigma (“supports”), dunastei/a ("sovereignty"), mawzin (a transcription) and katafugh/ ("refuge"). Verbs, particularly verbs of saying, are more susceptible to multiple equivalents. For example, the verbal form)rq ("call") is rendered by boa/w ("shout"), fwne/w ("speak loud"), a)naginw/skw ("read"), kale/w ("call") and e)pikale/w ("summon"). Excluding gnwri/zw ("to make known") from the list above, the OG uses some of the same stereotypes as TH, though OG departs more frequently from the default rendering and normally exhibits greater variety in vocabulary choices. The fact that they do employ some of the same stereotypes is more of a reflection of the pattern throughout the LXX than any necessary connection between the OG and TH in Daniel.

Selected Features

There are specific examples that demonstrate that both the OG and TH were concerned to produce readable and reliable translations of their source texts. For example, they both exhibit a flair for using similar sounds either in the Greek or to echo the source text. In 3.4 OG renders MT's)rq)wrzkw with kai\ o(kh=ruc e)kh/ruce ("And the herald heralded"). In 12.10 TH has kai\ a)nomh/swsin a1nomoi ("and the lawless act lawlessly") where OG employs kai\ a(ma/rtwsin oi9 a(martwloi/ ("and the sinners sin").

Despite TH's concern to produce a faithful translation, the OG is normally superior. For example, ei)dwlei/w| ("idol's temple"), kinduneu/sw tw~)di/w| traxh/lw| ("I will risk my own neck!") and di-amerisqh/setai (Munnich reads diamelisqh/setai) kai\ h(ou)si/a au)tou= dhmeuqh/setai ("will be dismembered, and his possessions confiscated") are accurate, yet colorful translations. TH's tendency to adhere more closely to the word order and a word-for-word translation limits the translator's ability in this area.

A notable difference between the translators is their approach to texts they had trouble understanding.

While the OG attempts to offer a translation based on the context, it appears that TH sometimes uses a transcription if the unknown word looks like it could be a proper noun. So TH renders ry((“watcher”) with ir (“lr”) while OG has a1ggeloj (“angel”). Other transcriptions by TH are forqommin (1.3), oubal (8.2), felmouni (8.13), baddin (10.5), mawzin (11.38) and efanaw (11.45). Incidentally, the fact that TH did not depend on the OG translation when TH did not understand the source text is significant evidence that TH is not a revision of the OG.

to the reader of daniel

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF DANIEL

General Approach

I have suggested that TH could be characterized as exhibiting formal equivalence to the source text, whereas OG may be understood as more dynamic or functional in its approach. I have attempted to reflect the subtle nuances in the differences in the translations according to the Greek, although the textual evidence for the OG is less than desirable in terms of producing a critical text. The evidence that we have suggests that both translations tend to follow the word order and reflect the syntax of the original; therefore, this equivalence to the source text is reflected in NETS. The OG departs more frequently from standard equivalents, though any variation of either translation is marked. Normally lexical equivalents for simple verbs and their compounds are distinguished with separate equivalents in NETS.

One of the areas where the basically literal approach of the translators will shine through is in the frequent appearance of the conjunction “and.” Both versions of Daniel tended to use the stereotyped equivalent kai/ (“and”) for the Semitic w, though there are occasions, more frequent in the OG, where participles or alternative conjunctions appear. Thus, it may be concluded that, when other conjunctions appear in NETS, this reflects a difference in the Greek and that, when sentences do not begin with a conjunction, there is an absence of such in the Greek.

The NETS Versions of OG and TH

One of the most challenging aspects of translating the two versions of Daniel into English is providing renderings that clarify both where the two versions are the same as well as where they are different.

The process of comparison is a constant juggling act, but there are some immediate and obvious guidelines that were followed that help to understand the translation. Since we are dealing with two translations and there is a desire to indicate both aspects of their relationships, there is an attempt to be consistent in the translation of vocabulary, particularly for stereotyped equivalents. Therefore, even if the word or phrase appears in different places in the narrative they are translated consistently. At the same time, variations in lexical or syntactical choices in the Greek versions are always marked in some way. Differences in the person of verbs are evident from the context, but singular vs. plural forms of verbs or nouns are indicated as well. Thus, in 1.10 the OG has the singular pro/swpon (“face”) where TH has the plural pro/swpa (“faces”). On the other hand, differences in case are not usually reflected in nouns.

Therefore, when some of the vocabulary in the two versions is the same but there are other differences in word order or content, the reader may conclude that these are accurate representations of the vocabulary and syntax of the Greek.

The reader should also be warned that it was not always possible to signal differences in the syntax of the Greek compared to the Hebrew. At times the translator of the NRSV chose a more idiomatic way to represent the Semitic text of Daniel, which coincides with changes introduced by the Greek translators.

As a result, NETS and NRSV agree in such cases.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

The TH version of Daniel is very similar to the Semitic text in the MT, and for this reason it will very often be quite similar to the NRSV. Besides the text of the OG, which often differs markedly from TH, particularly in chapters 4-6, there are a number of differences in the ordering of the verses among the versions.

For the numbering of the verses I have followed Ziegler/Munnich for both versions, but the NRSV number will follow in parentheses where it differs. A brief description of the variations is offered here. The inclusion of the Prayer of Azarias and the Song of the Three Young Men in chapter 3 in both Greek versions beginning in v. 24 (end of v. 23 in the OG) requires that the equivalent to 3.24-30 in the MT be numbered 3.91-97 in the Greek versions. The first three verses in chapter 4 in the NRSV actually correspond to 3.31-33 in the MT. So in TH they are numbered 3.98-100, but the equivalent to these verses, along with the additional material, is found at the end of chapter 4 in the OG. The result of this is that the verse numbers in the Greek versions are the same as the MT throughout chapter 4 but are three less than the NRSV, and the OG has additional material numbered 34a-c at the end of the chapter. In addition, there are also a number of omissions, pluses and alternative versions of passages throughout chapters 4-6 in 994

the OG. Chapter 5 has an extra preface at the beginning of the chapter in the OG. The first verse of chapter 6 is actually the last one in chapter 5 for the Greek versions, so the verse numbers are one less than the MT throughout the whole chapter, but the same as the NRSV. There are other isolated instances where the OG has a small difference in verse order or omits a verse.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

In addition to the standard reference tools, I was most appreciative of the English translation and commentary on chapters 4–6 by Lawrence M. Wills in The Jew in the Court of a Foreign King (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); Louis. F. Hartman and Alexander A. Di Lella in The Book of Daniel (AB 23; Garden City: Doubleday, 1978); and John J. Collins in Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993).

Bring sacrifice and offering to him gloriously. I, the king of kings, acknowledge him gloriously, because he has done thus with me. BEL AND THE DRAGON

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation of both versions has been based on the critical editions of Joseph Ziegler and Olivier Munnich (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum XVI.2: Susanna Daniel Bel et Draco [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999]). Munnich has revised Ziegler's critical edition of the Old Greek (OG) version (1954), because Ziegler did not have access to several important portions of papyrus 967. Accordingly, the NETS translation of the OG has been based on Munnich, while Theodotion (TH) has been translated from Ziegler. Items of dubious originality have been retained in square brackets.

THE TWO GREEK VERSIONS

Bel and the Dragon, like Sousanna and Daniel, is extant in two versions: the Old Greek (OG) and Theodotion (TH).

Although in length the two are approximately equal, certain details in fact and narration suggest that, at the level of the Greek, their relationship was minimal. Minor differences in detail include v. 3 where “forty” (TH) contrasts with “four” (OG) sheep, and “wine” is read by the one (TH) but “oil” by the other (OG). Although the plot is very similar throughout, there are differences. So, for example, v. 9 of TH has the king placing the onus on the priests to show that Bel is eating the offering, while in OG it is Daniel who assumes the burden of proof (for similar instances see vv. 19, 21). Similarly, the narrative perspective differs when the dragon is destroyed and the reaction thereto is narrated. To be noted is the end of v. 27 to the beginning of v. 28 for the difference in wording and the relative roles played by the people and the king vis-à-vis Daniel. This difference gives rise to others: according to v. 30 of OG the king takes the initiative to give Daniel over to destruction, whereas in TH (v. 29) the Babylonians take the lead.

Consequently, there is evidence to suggest that the two Greek versions of Bel and the Dragon are independent versions. As further evidence it may be noted that in vv. 7, 9, 11 OG reads respectively “I swear to you by the Lord God of the gods,” “But they said, ‘It is Bel himself who eats them,’ “ and “Now the word pleased the king,” all three of which are lacking in TH. Though in v. 14 OG notes that only Daniel knew about the ashes that had been sprinkled—a note which anticipates Daniel’s instructions to both the priest and the king in vv. 15-17—according to TH the priests are not even on the scene. (For similar “additions” see vv. 24, 31-32, 39.)

TH, on the other hand, has a “plus” in v. 5 when it includes that God “has dominion over all flesh.”

Another “plus” occurs in v. 25 when Daniel affirms that he worships the Lord, because he is the living God. (For smaller “pluses” see vv. 28, 32, 36.)

The comparative independence of the two Greek versions is further suggested by the few cases in which they share similar wording for large portions of a verse. An example is the first story about Bel, which ends at v. 22. Eleven times OG and TH have identical wording for part of a verse (4, 10, 23, 26, 28, 34, 35, 36, 38, 41, 42), but in most of these cases changes in word order and/or significant pluses or alternative readings are also present. Only three short passages (23, 26, 35) are nearly identical. Occasional agreements in vocabulary are not incompatible with the notion that we have two independent translations of a similar source text.

On a few occasions there is a close textual relationship between the two versions, but these agreements may be due to textual corruption. The verb “strew” (katash/qw) occurs in v. 14, although OG and TH employ different forms and the manuscripts for TH have several variant readings. V. 27 has “cake” (ma=za) in both versions, a word unique in the Septuagint. There may also be a relationship in v. 36: “take hold of the hair of his head” (e0pela/beto e0pilabo/menoi th=j ko/mhj th=j kefalh=j). Finally, the identical phrase “those responsible for his ruin” (tou\j de\ ai0ti/ouj th=j a)pwlei/aj au)tou=) in v. 42 seems to reflect a direct relationship between the two versions, particularly in the choice of ai0ti/ouj.

Based on the differences between the two versions it is possible that the source text of the OG was later edited, and the newer version is reflected in TH. For example, the identification of Daniel as a “priest, the

to the reader of bel and the dragon son of Habal” in OG v. 2 is not reflected elsewhere in the Daniel stories. In addition, the heading of OG identifies the story as a “prophecy of Hambakoum the son of Iesous of the tribe of Leui.” In TH, however, the story is dated to the time of Cyrus the Persian successor of Astyages (v. 1).

Given the paucity of distinctive agreements, the many differences in detail, and the way that the stories are told, they are best understood as distinct translations of a common story.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

The significant differences between the two versions raise the question of their possible source. Do the differences stem from widely differing Semitic source texts or from the translators? The answer is hampered by the fact that there is no extant Hebrew or Aramaic version of Bel and the Dragon. Moreover, the story is brief: forty-two verses in TH and thirty-eight in the OG. The differences between them, however, are probably a combination of diverging source and modes of translation.

Two main arguments may be used in support of Bel and the Dragon being a translation from a Semitic source: the presence of Semitisms and the relationship between the two versions. Unfortunately, there is not a great deal of evidence to consider. Semitic influence on the vocabulary and syntactic structure of the Greek texts is evident in the frequent appearance of kai/ “and” as a gloss for conjunctive w. The Hebrew phrase kai\ e)ge/neto (yhyw) also occurs three times in TH (vv. 14, 18, 28) and twice in OG (vv. 15, 33). TH further has i0dou/ twice (vv. 11, 40), though this need not be un-Greek. The odd expression e0n tw~|

r(oi/zw| tou= pneu/matoj au)tou= “in a rush of his spirit” in v. 36 of TH is best explained as a corruption from Hebrew or Aramaic. Suggestions have been made for other examples of Semitic influence in the story, but they are less viable as independent evidence.

In addition there is the relationship between the two versions. They follow the same basic plot and have some common vocabulary, which could be due to them being translations of a similar source.

Though it is difficult to identify aspects of the stories due to translation, TH reads like a translation based on formal equivalence of a Semitic text. OG does so at times, but it reads more like a dynamic translation or even a Greek composition. Thus, TH fits within the interlinear paradigm, while the OG is not so easily defined.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF BEL AND THE DRAGON

General Approach

Assuming that both versions are translations from Semitic source texts requires that our NETS translation reflect the linguistic relationship between them as closely as possible. Thus, compared to the NRSV the translation will at times be somewhat stilted and the grammar awkward, because we are attempting to reflect the relationship of the Greek to the Hebrew or Aramaic parent text. Although this is more true of the TH version, the parataxis of the Greek is present in both versions; therefore, it is retained in NETS. The translation of vocabulary also assumes an emphasis on the particular word rather than the context due to the subservience of the Greek to its source text. At the same time, NETS distinguishes those places where either of the translations exhibits variety in how they translated what most probably was the same phrase or word.

For example, in v. 3 OG has “were squandering” a)nhli/sketo, where TH employs “would spend” e)da-panw~nt,aond OG refers to “false doors” yeudoqu/ria in v. 21, while TH has “hidden doors” krupta\j qu/raj.

Comparing the OG and TH Translations

One of the most challenging aspects of the NETS translation for Daniel and the additional stories has been to compose a translation that both reflects the subservience of each version to its presumed source text while, at the same time, capturing the nature of the relationship of the two Greek versions to one another. This task has been the least difficult for Bel and the Dragon. Even when the stories overlap they often depart in other aspects. For example, in v. 18 when Daniel and the king (along with the king’s entourage in OG) enter the temple and find the food gone, the king addresses Bel in the second person (“you”) in TH, while Bel is referred to in the third person in the OG (see also v. 38). Throughout the two versions any connections between the vocabulary are maintained even when they appear in different verses or when there are other grammatical changes.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

The TH version of Bel and the Dragon is the basis for the NRSV translation; thus, the versification of NRSV and NETS TH correspond. The verse numbers are equivalent to those followed in both Rahlfs and Ziegler's edition. For the OG I have followed Ziegler/Munnich, which differs only in two places (v. 13 and v. 25) from Rahlfs.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

In addition to the standard reference tools I was most appreciative of the translation and commentary on Bel and the Dragon by Carey A. Moore, Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: the Additions (AB 44; Garden City: Doubleday, 1977), as well as by John J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993).
