TO THE READER OF NETS

The use of the term “Septuagint” in the title of A New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) requires some justification. According to legend¹ it was seventy(-two) Jerusalem elders who at the behest of King Ptolemy II (285–246 BCE) and with the consent of High Priest Eleazaros translated the Scriptures of Egyptian Jewry into Greek from a Jerusalem manuscript inscribed in gold. The event is said to have occurred on the island of Pharos in the Mediterranean Sea off the coast of Alexandria and to have taken seventy-two days. “Scripture,” however, comprised only the so-called five books of Moses, also known as the Pentateuch. Other books were translated in subsequent centuries and also in other locations. In time the entire anthology became popularly known as “the translation of the seventy,” irrespective of the precise origin of individual books.

Not surprisingly then, though the various parts of “the translation of the seventy” have many features in common, it is also true that, as modern scholarship has increasingly shown, there is wide-ranging diversity and heterogeneity within the collection—to the point that some scholars now question the continued use of the term “Septuagint,” which to the unwary reader might suggest a greater degree of uniformity than can be demonstrated. Though “Old Greek” would undoubtedly be a more suitable term to refer, in the case of each individual book or unit of translation, to the earliest rendition into Greek, NETS has bowed to the weight of tradition and has thus continued the use of the term “Septuagint.”

WHY A NEW ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF THE SEPTUAGINT?

Only two English translations of the entire Septuagint, albeit in modified form, have ever been published. The first was by the American businessman-scholar Charles Thomson and published together with his translation of the New Testament in 1808 and the second by the British cleric Sir Lancelot Charles Lee Brenton.² Thomson's rendition excludes the so-called deuterocanonical books, but does feature Ps 151. The order of books is that of the Hebrew canon. His translation was based indirectly—via J.

Field's edition of 1665 and the Sixtine edition of 1587—on a single manuscript, namely, the well-known fourth century CE manuscript Codex Vaticanus (B). No preface or notes of any kind were appended.

Brenton's work, though it appeared some thirty-five years later than Thomson's, acknowledges only cursory and indirect acquaintance with it. As the title indicates, it too is (indirectly) based on Codex Vaticanus. In the Preface (xi) Brenton gives the Valpy edition of 1819 as his immediate source, which in turn was based on the Sixtine edition. Like Thomson, Brenton translated only the books of the Hebrew canon, plus Psalm 151, and ordered them accordingly. For Esther, however, he did not excise the Additions, as Thomson had done. Notes of various kinds, embedded in the text, include variants from the fifth century Codex Alexandrinus (A), as well as comments on the Hebrew and Greek texts.

Of the two translations, Brenton's has easily been the more influential and, though not originally published with facing Greek and English texts, has long been made available as a diglot with both versions in parallel columns.

Since the publication of these two translations, now more than one hundred and fifty years ago, significant advances have been made in Greek lexicography, numerous ancient manuscripts have come to light, and important steps have been taken in recovering the pristine text of each Septuagint book. By way of comparison it may be noted that whereas both Thomson and Brenton were based on (essentially) diplomatic editions of a single manuscript, the critical edition of the Göttingen Septuagint for the book of Genesis rests on a foundation of some one hundred and forty manuscripts (nine pre-dating the fourth century CE), ten daughter-versions, plus biblical citations in Greek literature. A new translation of the Septuagint into English is, consequently, not only much needed for biblical studies but is in fact long overdue.

1 For the earliest full-blown version see the Letter of Aristeas §§28-33; 301-307.

to the reader of NETS

NETS AND THE NEW REVISED STANDARD VERSION

Ancient texts, including biblical texts, have been translated from time immemorial, and the need for such work continues. What is often less clear is the precise reading-public a translation should target. Because of its widely varied audience, this is perhaps especially true for biblical literature. Writing specifically on the topic of Bible translations, Nida and Taber³ envisaged no fewer than three such audiences.

It is usually necessary to have three types of Scriptures: (1) a translation which will reflect the traditional usage and be used in the churches, largely for liturgical purposes (this may be called an “ecclesiastical translation”), (2) a translation in the present-day literary language, so as to communicate to the well-educated constituency, and (3) a translation in the “common” or “popular”

language, which is known to and used by the common people, and which is at the same time acceptable as a standard for published materials.

NETS is aimed primarily at the reading public identified in Nida and Taber’s second grouping, namely, a biblically well-educated audience, on the assumption that it is most probably this audience that has a more than passing interest in traditions of biblical literature other than their own. Since NETS has been based, however, on the New Revised Standard Version (1989), its character can be said to derive, in part at least, from the NRSV.

That an existing English translation of the Hebrew Bible should have been used as a base for NETS perhaps needs some justification. Why not, it might be suggested, simply translate the Septuagint in the tradition of Thomson or Brenton, without any overt dependence on an English translation of the Hebrew?

The answer to this question is based, in the editors' view, on considerations of both principle and practicality. First, the considerations of principle.

While it is obvious that the so-called Septuagint in time achieved its independence from its Semitic parent, and that it at some stage in its reception history sheds its subservience to its source, it is equally true that it was, at its stage of production, a Greek translation of a Hebrew (or Aramaic) original. That is to say, the Greek had a dependent and subservient linguistic relationship to its Semitic parent. Or again, although the Septuagint was a translation of the Bible, it did not thereby automatically become a biblical translation. More particularly, for the vast majority of books the linguistic relationship of the Greek to its Semitic parent can best be conceptualized as a Greek interlinear translation of a Hebrew original within a Hebrew-Greek diglot. Be it noted immediately, however, that the terms "interlinear" and "diglot" are intended to be nothing more than (or less than) visual aids to help the reader conceptualize the linguistic relationship that is deemed to exist between the Hebrew original and the Greek translation. In other words, "interlinear" is a metaphor, and as such it points not to the surface meaning of its own components but to a deeper, less visual, linguistic relationship of dependence and subservience. As Max Black aptly states, a memorable metaphor has the power to bring two separate domains into cognitive and emotional relation by using language directly appropriate for the one as a lens for seeing the other . . .4

Be it noted further that the deeper linguistic reality, which the metaphor attempts to make more tangible, is in no way contingent on the existence of a physical, interlinear entity at any point during the third to the first centuries BCE. What precise physical format the translation took we may never know. A variety of possibilities is not difficult to imagine.

Looked at from a different perspective, NETS is presupposing a Greek translation which aimed at bringing the Greek reader to the Hebrew original rather than bringing the Hebrew original to the Greek reader.⁵ Consequently, the Greek's subservience to the Hebrew may be seen as indicative of its aim.

NETS has been based on the interlinear paradigm for essentially three reasons. First, the concept of interlinearity has superior explanatory power for the "translationese" character of Septuagint Greek, with its strict, often rigid, quantitative equivalence to the Hebrew. As Conybeare and Stock⁶ (and others) noted nearly a century ago, Septuagintal Greek is at times "hardly Greek at all, but rather Hebrew in disguise,"

3 Nida, E. A. and C. R. Taber, The Theory and Practice of Translation (Leiden: Brill, 1982) 31.

4 Max Black, Models and Metaphors (Ithaca NY: Cornell University Press, 1962) 236.

5 Cf. S. P. Brock, "The Phenomenon of the Septuagint," OTS 17 (1972) 17.

6 Conybeare, F. C. and St. G. Stock, Grammar of Septuagint Greek (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995 [expanded and reprinted from the edition originally published by Ginn and Company, Boston, 1905]) 21.

to the reader of NETS

especially in its syntax and word order. Secondly, interlinearity not only legitimates the use of the Hebrew parent as arbiter of established meanings in the target language but as well absolves the reader of positing new meanings derived solely from translation equivalency. Differently put, the interlinear paradigm recognizes that unintelligibility of the Greek text qua text is one of its inherent characteristics. Third-ly, and perhaps paradoxically, the interlinear paradigm safeguards the Greekness of the Septuagint by emphasizing that its linguistic strangeness, rather than reflecting a form of the living language at odds with its Hellenistic environment, was made to serve a specific (possibly pedagogical) purpose.

Thus whatever else one might consider the LXX to be—a repository of textual variants to the Masoretic Text, the oldest “commentary” on the Hebrew Bible, Holy Writ for Egyptian Jewry (at least from the time of Aristeeas) and, later, for Christianity—the Committee decided to focus on the most original character of this collection, namely, that of interlinearity with and dependence on the Hebrew, or, from a slightly different angle, the Septuagint as produced rather than as received. Or yet again, NETS aims to focus on the translated corpus in its Hebrew-Greek context.

Once the aim and focus of NETS had been decided upon, a methodological directive seemed compelling. If NETS was to render into English the Greek half of a Hebrew-Greek interlinear diglot posited as paradigm, its English text might then be made “interlinear to” a modern English translation of the current Hebrew text. Put another way, since NETS was to echo the original dependent relationship of the Greek upon the Hebrew, one could seemingly do no better than to base NETS on an existing English translation of the Hebrew and to modify that base as dictated by the Greek.

But if the linguistic makeup of the Septuagint can best be conceptualized in terms of interlinearity, it follows that, characteristically for interlinears, one should read the Septuagint as produced with one eye on the parent member of the diglot, namely, the Hebrew. Thus what this Septuagint says, and how it says it, can only be understood in its entirety with the help of the Hebrew. This interlinearity with and dependence on the Hebrew may be termed the constitutive character of the Septuagint, in contradistinction to its history of interpretation, or better, its reception history. From the NETS perspective these two aspects of the Septuagint are not only distinct but might in fact be termed the apples and oranges of its history.

In the light of what has been argued, it is thus appropriate to think of NETS along the lines of the Göttingen Septuagint: as the Göttingen editors attempt to establish the original form of the Greek text and in so doing draw on the Hebrew for text-critical leverage, so NETS has availed itself of what leverage the Hebrew can provide in arbitrating between competing meanings of the Greek. Moreover, just as the form of the original text differed from its later textual descendants, so what the original translator thought his text to mean differed from what later interpreters thought the text to mean.

But in addition to the dictum of principle, there emerged also an intensely practical consideration for basing NETS on an existing English translation of the Hebrew. In the Committee's view, important to the raison d' être of a new translation of the (original) Septuagint—i.e., a translation of a translation—is its synoptic potential. That is to say, users of such a translation, especially in light of the diglot paradigm, should be able to utilize it to the greatest degree achievable (within set parameters) in a comparative study of the Hebrew and Greek texts, albeit in English translation. This aim could best be realized, the Committee believed, if English translations of the Hebrew and the Greek were as closely interrelated as the two texts themselves dictate or warrant, both quantitatively and qualitatively. In other words, ideally the user of NETS would be able to determine not only matters of longer or shorter text and major transpositions of material, but also questions of more detailed textual, interpretational, and stylistic difference. Needless to say, the Committee harbors no illusions about this goal having been fully reached.

Given the above decision, essentially two options were open: (1) one could first translate the MT into English and then use this translation as the point of departure for an English translation of the Greek, or (2) one could use an existing English translation of the MT as base. Clearly the latter route recommended itself as being the more practical and economical one. It was, furthermore, difficult for the Committee to see how the work of the committees of scholars that have produced the major English translations of the Hebrew could be greatly improved upon even though they are admittedly translations of a presumed original rather than being translations of a translation, like NETS.

NETS AS MODIFIED NRSV

Two considerations have guided the Committee in choosing an English version as the base text for NETS: (1) general compatibility of translational approach with that of the LXX itself and (2) widespread use among readers of the Bible. The New Revised Standard Version, based as it is on the maxim “as literal as possible, as free as necessary” (Preface), was thought to be reasonably well suited to NETS’ purposes on both counts. Consequently, throughout those Septuagint books which have extant counterparts in xvi

to the reader of NETS

Hebrew (or Aramaic), NETS translators have sought to retain the NRSV to the extent that the Greek text, in their understanding of it, directs or permits. NETS' synoptic aim, however, has not been allowed to interfere with faithfulness to the Greek text.

When NETS differs from the NRSV, the reason is typically one of the following: (1) the lexical choice of the NRSV to represent the Hebrew differs significantly from that of the Greek translator's, even though either rendering, independently, might be regarded as an adequate translation of the same Hebrew; (2) differences in translational approach between the translators of the NRSV and the ancient Greek translators has occasioned noteworthy differences between the two versions (for example, in any given passage, the Greek might be hyper-literalistic, where the NRSV is not, or again it might be very free, which the NRSV is not); (3) an attempt to reflect linguistic features in the Greek, such as word echoes or paratactic style, at times has required that the NRSV wording be modified; (4) the Greek translator has apparently rendered a text at variance with MT, due to textual difference; (5) the NRSV has opted for gender-inclusive or explicit language, eschewed by NETS; (6) the NRSV has not translated MT, but opted instead for some other reading. Naturally, where, in such instances, the NRSV has adopted the reading of the Septuagint, NETS and NRSV agree. As a rule such cases have been annotated in the NRSV, but the reader should not take for granted that the precise English word used by the NRSV has been adopted by NETS.

The Committee's desire to enable the reader to make use of NETS in synoptic manner with the NRSV has been second only to its commitment to giving a faithful rendering of the Greek original. In fact, NETS may be said to have two competing aims: (1) to give as faithful a translation of the Greek as is possible, both in terms of its meaning and in terms of its mode of expression and (2) to create a tool in English for the synoptic study of the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Bible. Since these are competing aims, the translator often, especially on the expression side, has been called upon to do a balancing act.

TRANSLATING A TRANSLATION

Translating an ancient text can only be described as a profoundly difficult undertaking. Not only do translators have to contend with the natural gulf that exists between languages and with the absence of the authors who wrote the pieces in question, but they also suffer from the lack of native speakers of the ancient languages, who might be cajoled into giving some much needed help. Consequently, what the modern translator of an ancient text is trying to do is something like starting up a one-way conversation, or a monologue that passes for a dialogue. Translation, as someone has aptly noted, is an act of hubris.

The difficulties of the undertaking are certainly not decreased when one attempts to translate an ancient translation into a modern language. If translating is an act of interpreting, as linguists suggest it is, rather than a simple transfer of meaning, a Greek interpretation of a Hebrew original can be expected to reflect what the translator understood the Hebrew text to mean. The end result is therefore inevitably to some degree a commentary written at a specific historical time and place by an individual person, whose understanding of the Hebrew will often have been at variance with our own, though at times perhaps equally viable.

But as has already been suggested by the interlinear paradigm, much of the Septuagint is a translation of a special kind. Thus whereas a translation that replaces the original can be counted on to “solve” the problems of the original, in an interlinear rendition these may simply be passed on to the reader. In fact new problems might often be created because of its inherent preoccupation with representing as much of the linguistic detail of the original as possible. All of this is not to say that the interlinear type of translators of the LXX had no concern for making sense, but simply that the interlinear language-game of the ancient translator has added an extra dimension to the problems faced by the modern translator. The notion of constitutive character, introduced earlier, comprises inter alia certain realities of the source language, Hebrew (or Aramaic). Just as inappropriate as accusing the interlinear translator of lacking concern for making sense would be to saddle him with inadequate knowledge of Greek, since his use of Greek is determined by the aim he wishes to achieve, whatever that be.

The paradigm of the Septuagint as an interlinear text within a Hebrew-Greek diglot, in contradistinction to the Septuagint as a free-standing, independent text now calls for a further distinction alluded to earlier, namely, that between the text as produced, on the one hand, and the text as received, on the other.

The distinction is important because it demarcates two distinct approaches to the Greek text. That is to say, one can either seek to uncover the meaning of the Greek text in terms of its interlinear dependence on the Hebrew, or one can aim at rendering the meaning of the text from the perspective of its reception history, i.e., in terms of its autonomy. The difference between the two may be simply illustrated. Though the entire Greek language community of third to the first centuries BCE would agree that Greek du/namij sometimes means “host/army” but at other times means “power/might,” which component of meaning to the reader of NETS was right for which context might well be a matter of dispute. From the perspective of the Septuagint text as an independent, self-sufficient entity, context is recognized as the sole arbiter of meaning. That is to say, should the context speak of military might, du/namij would be translated by “army,” but if the (Greek) context be about bodily might instead, du/namij would be rendered by “power/might.” On the other hand, from the perspective of the Septuagint as a dependent, subservient entity, one could not agree that context is the sole arbiter of meaning. What if context should admit either reading and thus fail to steer the reader into one direction or the other? In that case, based on our diglot model, the Hebrew parent text would be the arbiter in the dispute. Should the underlying Hebrew have bc (“army, war, warfare”), Greek du/namij should be understood as “host/army,” but if the Hebrew be z (“strength, might”) instead, du/namij would have to be understood as meaning “might/strength.” An even simpler example is the distinction between the Greek pronouns “us” and “you”(pl) (e.g., h9mw~annd u9mw~n) which, due to their identical pronunciation in post-Classical Greek, are frequently confused in Greek manuscripts.

Which of the two is to be regarded as original LXX can often be determined only by using the Hebrew as arbiter. The latter example underscores the analogy between NETS and the Göttingen Septuagint.

Perhaps the most obvious examples of Septuagintal dependence (as opposed to independence) are cases in which, due to the ambiguity inherent in Greek grammar, only the syntactic relationships (e.g., subject or object role) of the Hebrew can guide the English translator to what the Greek text means. Thus a sentence such as τὸ παιδίον εἶδεν might mean either “the child saw” or “(s)he saw the child.”

The distinction between the text as an independent entity or the text as a dependent entity is, therefore, not only a valid one in terms of the NETS paradigm, but in the Committee’s view, it is an important methodological stance for translators of the Septuagint as produced, with frequent practical consequences for NETS. Differently put, one can either treat the LXX as though it were an original (as Charles Thomson did) or one can treat it as a translation of an original in a non-Greek language. Though both are worthy undertakings in their own right, NETS perceives them as fundamentally different.

Constitutive character or Sitz im Leben is a figure for socio-linguistic realities. As such it includes not only what, judging from the language used, the text overtly means but also what at times resulted covertly from the model that informed the translator’s work. Again, inherent in the model of the LXX as an interlinear rendition is the word-by-word method of translating, including the so-called structural words (articles, prepositions, conjunctions). Also to be expected from an interlinear perspective are standard and stereotypical equations between Hebrew and Greek words, again often including structural words.

For these reasons and more, though the LXX is in Greek, there is also much that is decidedly un-Greek.

“The voice is Jakob’s, but the hands are Esau’s” (Gen 27.22) is a statement aptly applied to much of the Septuagint.

HOW NETS DETERMINES WHAT THE GREEK MEANS

Simply put NETS has been governed by five lexical guidelines, which can be made to apply as well, mutatis mutandis, to the grammar of Septuagint Greek, and all of them are implicit in or concordant with the interlinear paradigm: (1) Greek words in the LXX normally mean what they meant in the Greek of that period (statistically the vast majority of the lexical stock belongs here); (2) the precise nuance of Greek words is sometimes arbitrated by the Hebrew parent text (see the du/namij and h9mw~n/u9mwi~ trations above); (3) some Greek words, when they are used rigidly as uniform renderings of the corresponding Hebrew words, fit poorly into some of the contexts in which they stand—these may be dubbed stereotypes (see e.g., “will” [qe/lhma] for NRSV’s “desire” in Ps 1.2); (4) some Greek words in the LXX have been selected by the translator solely because of their perceived connection with (a) Hebrew morpheme(s)—

these may be called isolates (see e.g., yb [oh please!] = e0n e0moi/ = “in/with me” in 1Rgns 1.26 et al.); (5) some Greek words in the LXX have Hebrew meanings, i.e., the chief meaning of the Hebrew counterpart has been transferred to the Greek, which has then become part of the living language—these may be labeled calques (see e.g., tyrb = diaqh/kh = “covenant” throughout the LXX, but “will, testament” in extra-biblical Greek). Calques may be expected to predate the Septuagint. Graphically these guidelines may be represented as follows: Contextual

renderings ————— Stereotypes |
Calques ————— renderings

The vertical line on the scale represents a semantic demarcation, since words or lexemes placed to the left are governed by their normal Greek semantic range, while those to the right may in part be governed by their Hebrew counterparts, though, when such is the case, not by their full semantic range.

NETS trans-

lators have ordered the linguistic information of the Greek in terms of this scale and have translated accordingly.

Though the full extent of the scale may be represented in all books or units of translation of the Septuagint, not all may show the same translation profile. Two factors that may have exercised a direct influence on a given book's profile are its degree of literalness and its relative chronological placement within the corpus. By literalness is here understood the degree of consistency of Hebrew-Greek verbal equations, as well as the relative number of such one-to-one equations a given book or translation unit features. Potentially a book's chronological place within the corpus determines the number of calques it contains. That is to say, the later the book the more calques may have been part of its translator's every-day, living lexicon.

Even though, in deference to long-standing usage, the title of the NETS project speaks of the literature as a body, namely, the Septuagint, it has already been noted that the members of this anthology show considerable diversity, the interlinear model notwithstanding. Thus, Greek translations within it range all the way from highly literal to very free. Moreover, on a scale extending from what might be called the prototypical translator, who acts as a mere conduit for his author, to the prototypical author, who composes everything from scratch, Septuagintal writers would be seen scattered along most of its baseline.

One finds not only full-fledged authors (e.g., 2 Makkabees and Wisdom of Salomon) who composed their works in Greek, but also bona fide translators who in varying degrees attempted to approximate our prototypical translator. Thus one might note, for example, Ecclesiast (Qoheleth) as the most prototypical translator (being very literal) and Job as the least prototypical (being very free). Needless to say, a looser translator must be labeled part author. NETS introductions to individual books or units are designed to give some detail on the nature of individual translations.

What has been noted in the preceding paragraph draws attention to a number of facts. First, though the paradigm basic to NETS is that of the Septuagint as an interlinear text, it does not follow that all interlinear texts are equally literalistic. Second, there are within the translated corpus exceptions that prove the rule, such as Job, Proverbs, Esaias (?) and Esther in part. Third, those books originally composed in Greek, such as 2-4 Maccabees and Wisdom of Solomon, by virtue of not being translations are not governed by the NETS paradigm.

NETS: ITS CHARACTER AND EXTENT

Though NETS is based on the NRSV, it is not intended to be the-NRSV-once-over-lightly but rather a genuine representation of the Greek, reflecting not only its perceived meaning but also, to the extent possible in an English translation, its literary nuggets as well as its infelicities, pleonasms, problems and co-nundra.

One scarcely expects literary beauty and rhetorical flourish from an interlinear text, since that was clearly not its purpose. In fact, it would make little sense to accuse an interlinear translator of lack of literary sense. When literary beauty occurs it is the exception that proves the rule. Consequently, NETS readers would be remiss in expecting literary elegance in the English. That would have required, from the NETS perspective, a different Greek. Since the Septuagint, with a few exceptions, was not originally composed in Greek and often used unidiomatic Greek, a fully idiomatic translation into English can scarcely be justified. Consequently NETS is perforce more a translation of formal correspondence than one of dynamic equivalence. All in all, what readers can expect is a reasonable facsimile of the (original) Septuagint such as it is, including many of its warts. For commentary, one may consult the forthcoming series, the Society of Biblical Literature Commentary on the Septuagint (SBLCS).

The reason for the NETS approach is integral to the NETS aim: that of reflecting the Septuagint's constitutive character and of attempting to capture the incipit of the history of interpretation of what in time became the Greek Bible. Implicit in this aim has been a concerted effort not to make the Greek text say more than is strictly warranted, but to leave such elaboration to later stages of exegesis or eisegesis, as the case may be.

Names have been treated in essentially two ways: (1) as translations of Hebrew (or Aramaic), i.e., names in general use in the Hellenistic world apart from the LXX, and (2) as transcriptions of Hebrew (or Aramaic), i.e., names produced de novo from the source language. The former have been given their standard equivalent in English (e.g., Egypt and Syria), while the latter appear in English transcription (e.g., Dauid and Salomon).

Since the Septuagint collection includes translations from extant Hebrew (Aramaic) sources and translations of lost Semitic works, as well as books originally composed in Greek, the Committee has decided to be inclusive. To cite the NETS Statement of Principles (art. 3): "For the purposes of NETS, the term

to the reader of NETS

'Septuagint' is understood to be exemplified by, but not in all respects . . . congruent with, Alfred Rahlfs'

Septuaginta (1935)."

One "book" not included in NETS, however, is Odes since it has dubious integrity as a literary unit, and, in any case, almost all of the individual Septuagint odes have already been included in their native setting in other books. The sole exception is Ode 12 in Rahlfs' edition, the Prayer of Manasses, which for that reason has been separately appended to the Psalter.

The one major addition to Rahlfs has been the so-called Alpha-Text of Esther. Here and elsewhere the Committee has been guided by the Göttingen Septuagint, which has presented two Greek texts of Esther in parallel. While it is true that in Esther and in certain other books (Judges and Tobit, for example) it is most unlikely that both texts, qua texts, can lay equal claim to originality, the texts that have been transmitted clearly defy conflation. Furthermore, even though the Committee aims to present the original Septuagint or Old Greek in English translation, here too it has not been oblivious to the weight of tradition.

Thus, though in Job the Septuagint has been presented as the main text of NETS, the asterisked materials, sanctioned solely by ecclesiastical usage, have been included, albeit conspicuously marked off. For the same reason, the so-called Greek II text of Sirach, added in small print in Ziegler's edition, has been included. Similar procedures have been followed in other books (see Introductions to individual books).

A special effort has been made in the case of books with parallel Greek texts to reflect their interrelationships in English.

Clearly where no parent texts are extant, whether because they have been lost or because they never existed, no comparison can be attempted between (Semitic) original and (Greek) translation. Thus, whether a book has been composed originally in Greek or is based on a lost original, it has been treated as an original, even though an effort has been made to reflect its style. Similarly, since the synoptic aim of NETS is not applicable in these cases, the NRSV has functioned only optionally as the base text for the NETS translator, though certain basic NETS practices and procedures have been carried through, especially in terms of translation style and names.

GREEK TEXT

Since NETS claims to be a translation of the Greek text as it left the hands of its respective translators—

or a “Göttingen Septuagint in English form”—it stands to reason that NETS has been based on the best available critical editions. That is to say, where available, NETS has used the Göttingen Septuagint, and Rahlfs’ manual edition has been used for the remainder of the books. In the event that new and improved critical editions appear during the life of the project, the Committee is committed to using these, if at all possible. But since no edition, no matter how carefully and judiciously executed, can lay claim to being the definitive text of the Greek translator, NETS translators have from time to time sought to improve on their respective base texts. Just how much will have been changed varies with the quality of the edition used. All such deviations, however, have been meticulously noted.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

Since NETS has used the NRSV as its base text, it stands to reason that some of the latter's editorial policy has been continued.

More specifically the NRSV for its so-called Old Testament segment has maintained the traditional distinction between shall (should) and will (would), and NETS has followed suit.

Though the NRSV adopted the practice of distinguishing between the Hebrew divine names Yahweh and Adonai by means of printing "LORD" and "Lord" as respective equivalents, NETS has felt committed to this practice only where it can be shown that the Greek translator made a comparable distinction between Yahweh and Adonai. Otherwise Greek ku/rioj has been routinely represented by English "Lord."

The footnoting of the NRSV has been largely followed in NETS, though the specific content is often of a different kind. In NETS footnotes are generally of five kinds: (1) deviations from the Greek text used as base; (2) linguistic items in the English but lacking in the Greek; (3) graded (in terms of preference) alternative translations to the lemma text; (4) elucidations of various kind; (5) indications of a very obscure Greek text.

Deviations from the Greek text have been further divided into additions, omissions and transpositions. All three kinds of deviations from the Greek edition used are followed by an equal sign (=) in order to indicate the source of the variation without implying exact equivalence. Substitutions for obvious reasons have not been tagged as such.

Items in the English that are explicitly lacking in the Greek have been included when the information is judged to be implicit. When, however, added items may have some possible bearing on the interpretation of the text, they have been tagged. Hence the employment of this category is one of several ways in which NETS has sought to present the reader with the maximum of interpretational openness the Greek translator's text offers.

to the reader of NETS

The category of other translations comprises alternative renderings of the Greek that are deemed to have varying degrees of warrant in the Greek. These degrees, in descending order of acceptability, have been marked as (a) alternative rendering (to the NETS text) marked by "or," (b) alternative rendering preceded by "possibly," (c) alternative rendering preceded by "perhaps." Again, the intent here is to present translation options supported by the Greek.

Clarifications are intended to communicate useful information to the reader. They are preceded by

"i.e." or are phrased more explicitly.

The flagging of uncertainty in the Greek text has been a measure of last resort and has been used very sparingly, since it is of very limited help to the reader. Items so marked are typically clear from a textual point of view but very obscure as to their coherent sense.

Chapter and verse numbers in NETS follow those of the particular Greek text edition that has been used as base. The numbering of the NRSV, which often though not always follows MT, has been supplied in parentheses when different.

Since the NT regularly cites the Septuagint and synoptic use of the Bible is an important aim of NETS, translators have made an effort to align NETS and the NRSV NT in such cases, using similar principles to those outlined above.

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of the book of Genesis is based on the standard critical edition prepared by John William Wevers (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum 1: Genesis [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1974]).

In addition, I have incorporated changes to the critical text proposed by the editor in his Notes on the Greek Text of Genesis (SBLSCS 35; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993) wherever alteration of the Septuaginta edition has implications for the English translation. In such cases, the difference between the edition and the emended text of Notes is duly recorded in the NETS footnotes. For example, in Gen 17.3 bface downb represents the changed text of Wevers' Notes (WeN) while b on his face = Weed in the footnote reflects the text of the critical edition.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

General Character

The overall assessment of Greek Genesis is that, lexically and syntactically, it is a strict, quantitative representation of its source text. Thus the concept proposed in NETS discussions of the Septuagint (LXX) as an interlinear translation is an apt metaphor for this book because of the significant degree of dependence on the Hebrew that it exhibits. However, this general characterization of LXX Genesis as being slavishly subservient to the Hebrew needs to be nuanced somewhat in the light of the Greek translator's periodic departures from his typical patterns to produce renderings that reflect Greek usage rather than Hebrew idiom, or that, in one way or another, contextualize a given passage for the benefit of the Greek reader.

Semantic Leveling

Several observations can be made about the set of Hebrew-Greek equivalences that exist in the book of Genesis. For example, a Greek term often will serve as the counterpart to several different Hebrew terms throughout the book, a practice called semantic leveling. There are more than 75 cases in Genesis of one Greek word being used to gloss three or more Hebrew words. Some of these, like a)diqe/w “be wronged, do injustice, injure” (smx, q#(, rq#) and a)diki/a “wrongdoing, injustice” (smx, Nw(, q#(, (#p), are cognates. Others belong to the same semantic domain, like the preceding, but are not cognates: e.g., gh= “earth, land, ground, country, world” (hmd), Cr), rp() and xw&ra “country, territory” (rw), Cr), hd#).

Where possible this leveling has been reproduced in the NETS translation. One does not, of course, automatically translate a Greek term the same way each time it appears, because any lexeme typically has a range of denotations. Yet the likelihood of translation uniformity in English is increased when a single Greek term is used to render several Hebrew ones. In such cases, the NRSV often has a different English term for each Hebrew one. Consequently the NRSV rendering may well have been altered for NETS to reflect the semantic leveling that occurs in the Greek vis-à-vis the Hebrew. A case in point involves gh= as the equivalent for several terms in the standard Hebrew Masoretic Text (MT).

TO THE READER OF Genesis

In the preceding examples, decisions as to which English terms to use for NETS are based on factors such as their suitability in context as equivalents for $gh=$, and the way in which, in a given chapter or peri-cope, those terms reflect the Greek translator's uniformity of word choice in rendering a variety of Hebrew terms.

Semantic Differentiation

Although there is a good deal of evidence for semantic leveling in LXX Genesis, a significant amount of semantic differentiation also takes place. Such situations often showcase the translator's skill or creativity in employing a variety of Greek equivalents for individual Hebrew terms or expressions in accordance with the demands of each context.

Hebrew verbs tend to generate greater numbers of Greek counterparts than nouns or adjectives do. One such verb is Klh, which occurs 113 times in the Qal stem, and for which the LXX translator has used sixteen verbal roots as well as the adverbial forms deu~r(o3) "come" and deu=te (2) "come." In the majority of cases (58%), poreu/omai (61) "go, proceed, walk, walk on, journey, travel" and its compound forms pro-poreu/omai (2) "go on, go on before," and sumporeu/omai (3) "journey together, go along" serve as equivalents. e1rxomai (3) "go, come" and its compounds a)pe/rxomai (21) "go away, go off, depart," die/rxomai (1) "go through" and e)ce/rxomai (1) "go forth" account for another 23%. The other Greek verbal roots that have been selected to render the Qal of Klh are: a)podidra/skw (1) "escape," a)poi/xomai (2) "depart," a)polu/omai (1) "go away," a)potre/xw (2) "hurry off, leave quickly," badi/zw (1) "go," e)pife/romai (1) "be carried along," oi1xomai (3) "leave, go away," and probai/nw (1) . . . gi/nomai (1) "keep getting (greater)."

The three remaining cases of Qal Klh are not represented quantitatively in the Greek. Three additional Greek verbal roots serve as counterparts to the Hithpael stem of Klh in the eight places that it occurs in Genesis: diodeu/w (1)

“pass through,” eu)areste/w “be well pleasing (to / before God)” (6) in a dynamic equivalent rendering of ynpl / t) Klhth “walk (with / before God)” and peripate/w (1) “walk about.”

The Hebrew noun #pn can serve as a representative example of non-verbal forms that exhibit semantic differentiation. In 41 of the 43 contexts in which it is found (95%), the LXX translator’s equivalent is yuxh/ “animating force, creature, being, soul, life, heart, person.” In the remaining cases, however, the translator has chosen the plural of a)nh/r, “men,” to describe the ones whom Abram rescued from the coalition of kings who had invaded the cities of the plain (14.21) and the plural of sw~m “slaves” to depict members of Esau’s household (36.6).

Neologisms

The LXX of Genesis features approximately 50 terms that do not appear in extant Greek literature that dates prior to the creation of this translation. Most of these, of course, are based on existing stems, and so some whose cognates do pre-date, or are contemporaneous with, the LXX may well already have been in use. The fact that they are previously unattested is no doubt accidental. Examples of this sort include compounds with the a)rxī- prefix, a good number of which apparently made their first appearance in the Hellenistic period. Thus in Genesis one encounters forms like a)rxidesmofu/lac / a)rxidesmw/thj “chief jailer,” a)rxima/geiroj “chief butcher,” and a)rxisitopoio/j “chief baker,” whose unprefixed forms desmofu/lac / desmw/thj “jailer,” ma/geiroj “butcher,” and sitopoio/j “baker” are attested by the time of the translation of the Pentateuch into Greek. Similarly, terms like diasafw/fhsij “explanation” and o)rqri/zw “rise/start early” are likely to have been in use, since cognates (e.g., diasafe/w “make quite clear,” o)lraqroj “dawn”) were well known.

The Genesis translator follows various conventions of word formation. A term like baruwpe/w “be heavy-sighted” (48.10), for example, combines the adjective baru/j “heavy” with the noun w!y “eye,” and to the resulting compound is attached the verbal suffix -e/w which typically denotes either a condition or an activity (in this case it is the former). For gambreu/w, the translator has begun with the noun gam-bro/j, whose semantic domain has to do with a connection by marriage and which, in a given context, can be applied to any one of a number of different kinds of male in-laws and has added the verbal suffix -eu/w, which has the force of “acting the part of,” hence, “act the part of a brother-in-law” (38.8). The noun e)nta/fion “shroud, winding-sheet” is the basis for e0ntafia/zw, the form that the LXX translator creates by adding the verbal suffix -a/zw denoting action, i.e., “prepare for burial” (50.2). The new cognate noun e0ntafiasth/j “undertaker,” which appears in the same verse, exhibits the nominal suffix -th&j signifying the agent or doer of an action. The technical term qusiasth/rion “altar” is the product of the addition of the suffix -th/rion, signifying place, to qusi/a (noun) / qusia/zw (verb) “sacrifice.” A puzzling development is the Genesis translator’s invention of the term a)krobusti/a “foreskin” (17.11 passim), given that a)kroposqi/a “tip of the foreskin” (cf. posqi/a “foreskin”) was already in use. Some have speculated that the translator combined a)kro/j “at the farthest point/end” with a Semitic root signifying pudenda (b;t), but whatever the process it seems likely that a)krobusti/a is derived from a0kroposqi/a.

Stereotypes

While the translation style of the LXX of Genesis is literalistic in nature, the meanings of the Greek words are usually ones that are attested in other non-translation Greek literature. This is true even in situations when rigid adherence to an established Hebrew-Greek equivalence gives rise to a reading that is in tension with its context. Examples of such stereotypes in Genesis include αυ0ca/nw “to increase” (for the Hebrew counterpart hrp signifying “to be fruitful”), eu9ri/skw “to find” (note especially 26.12 where Hebrew)cm connotes “reap,” as the NRSV indicates), qa/lassa “sea” (particularly in the places where My signifies the westward direction), o1roj “mountain” (where rh refers generally to hill country), xei=loj “lip, edge” (where hp# denotes “language”).

Calques

A number of calques (see “TO THE READER OF NETS”) make their appearance in the Greek Genesis.

They include terms such as diaqh/kh “covenant” = tyrb, eu)loge/w “to bless” = Krb Piel, kibwto/j “ark” = hbt, ku/rioj “(the) LORD” = hwhy, parakale/w “to comfort / be comforted” = Mxn Piel/Niphal/Hithpael, paroike/w “to reside as an alien” = rwg, paroi/khsij “living as an alien” = rwgm, and stere/wma “firmament” = (yqr.

Isolates

Examples of isolates (see “TO THE READER OF NETS”) may be found in LXX Gen 7.4 and 7.23, where the use of e0cana/stasij “a rising up” and a)na/sthma “something that rises” as equivalents for Mwqy “living thing” (NRSV) is apparently occasioned by the desire to reflect the root Mwq “arise, stand up, stand” by means of cognates of its Greek semantic counterpart, i3sthmi. Similarly, the rationale for perath/j “emigrant” in Gen 14.13 as a rendering of yrb(“Hebrew” in reference to Abram would undoubtedly be that both have etymological links to verbs denoting “to traverse” and cognates connoting “on the other side.”

Loan Words and Transcriptions

The most literal of translation strategies in the LXX involves simply the transcription of the letters of a Hebrew word into Greek characters. This happens frequently when it comes to the rendering of names in Genesis, though other terms are handled in the same fashion. xeroubi/m “cheroubim” (3.24) is the transcription of Mybrk, an equivalence that obtains throughout the LXX. As Jews conversant with the Hebrew Bible, LXX translators must have had some familiarity with the traditions concerning the identity of these creatures, though they apparently knew of no Greek counterparts that could serve as suitable equivalents. In another case involving sabe/k = Kbs (22.13), however, the transcription seems to have come about because the Genesis translator was not sure about the meaning of the Hebrew term. That the translator understood it was some kind of plant is evident from the fact that it is paired attributively with futo/n, i.e., “a sabek plant.” A term like a)rrabw/n “pledge” (Hebrew Nwbr [Gen 38.17, 18, 20]), on the other hand, is not just a transcription but a true loan word, derived from a Semitic root, that was in use already in pre-LXX Greek.

Hebraisms

The Genesis translator's dependence on the underlying Hebrew text is exemplified not only by recurring semantic equivalences in the book but also by the number of cases of rigid adherence to Hebrew idiom resulting in quantitative equivalences. The latter can be divided into two broad categories: (1) Hebrew idiomatic constructions that have no precedent in Greek and (2) constructions in Greek for which there is some precedent in pre-LXX literature but which are attested in the LXX much more frequently than they are elsewhere.

In Genesis, examples of the first category include constructions that are reproduced as literalistically in NETS as they have been in the LXX (English translations of the Hebrew are taken from the NRSV).

had set up his tent” = $\text{wlh) M}\# \text{h}+\text{n r}\#)\text{hd}\# \text{h tq}|\text{x t)}$ “the Constructions of the second category (those for which there is some pre-LXX precedent though not with the frequency attested in the LXX) are translated for NETS with varying degrees of literalness, depending on the degree to which they reflect standard Greek idiom and meet the NETS requirement for grammatical English. A case in point involves the use of the particle $\text{ei}0$ in questions. In addition to its in-terjectional and conditional uses, $\text{ei}0$ is employed in pre-LXX Greek in indirect and alternative questions, but in LXX Genesis it can appear as a counterpart to the Hebrew conditional/ interrogative particle M) in direct questions: e.g., $\text{ei}0 [= \text{M)] Sa/rra e)\text{nenh/konta e})\text{tw}\sim\text{n ou]sa te/ceta}$ “is;hall Sarra who is ninety years of age give birth?” (17.17). The use of the $\text{e)n tw}\sim$

+ | infinitive construction (= b + infinitive construct) in circumstantial clauses likewise predates the LXX, though the frequency of its occurrence in Genesis and elsewhere in the biblical corpus is greater. One of the 18 examples of this equivalence in Genesis is found in 34.22: e0n tw~| perite/mnesqaimhw~n p~an arseniko“nwhen every male of ours is circumcised”; wnl lwmhb rkz lk “that every male among us be circumcised” (NRSV).

The Greek default for the ubiquitous Hebrew conjunction w is kai/. Its usual NETS equivalent when Hebrew parataxis is replicated is “and,” though this may mean departure from the NRSV when the latter glosses with inferential, adversative or other kinds of counterparts. Alternatives to “and” in NETS include

“with” and “along with.” “Then” is sometimes employed when kai/ marks continuing narrative sequence and the subject of the conjoined clauses/sentences remains the same: e.g., “And when Abraam looked up with his eyes he saw the place far away. Then Abraam said . . . ” (22.4-5). Typically “that then” is the NETS gloss when the LXX reproduces Hebrew idiom by introducing apodotic clauses by means of kai/ (=

w): e.g., e)ge/neto de\ h9ni/ka e)ch/gage/n me o9 qeo\j e)k tou= oi]kou tou= patro/j mou, kai\ ei]pa “Now it came about when God brought me forth from my father’s house, that then I said . . . ” (20.13). Wherever possible, the presence in the LXX of something other than the default rendering of the Hebrew w conjunction (de/for example) is indicated in NETS by modification of the NRSV: e.g., 9Rebe/kka de\ h)ga/pa to\n Olakw&b “Rebekka, however, loved Iakob”; bq(y t) tbh) hqbrw “but Rebekah loved Jacob” (NRSV [25.28]).

Other Translation Issues

In the matter of tense-aspect equations, the Genesis translator's default for Hebrew preterites and perfects is the aorist and for imperfects it is the future indicative. Thus where these patterns are not maintained, I endeavor to indicate that with modifications to the NRSV.

7.19: "The waters swelled (Hebrew perfect) so mightily on the earth that all the high mountains under the whole heaven were covered (Hebrew preterite) . . . "; "So the water was prevailing (Greek imperfect) very greatly on the earth, and it covered (Greek aorist) all the high mountains that were under heaven . . . "

31.39: "That which was torn by wild beasts I did not bring (Hebrew perfect) to you; I bore the loss of it myself (Hebrew prefix conjugation / imperfect); of my hand you required it, whether stolen by day or stolen by night." " . . . that which was caught by wild beasts I have not brought back (Greek perfect) to you; I would exact (Greek imperfect) from myself what was stolen by day and what was stolen by night . . . "

38.23: " . . . you see, I sent (Hebrew perfect) this kid, and you could not find (Hebrew perfect) her."

"I, for my part, have sent (Greek perfect) this kid, whereas you have not found (Greek perfect) her."

42.38: "My son shall not go down (Hebrew imperfect) with you, for his brother is dead (Hebrew perfect), and he alone is left (Hebrew participle). If harm should come (Hebrew perfect) to him on the journey that you are to make (Hebrew imperfect), you would bring down (Hebrew perfect) my gray hairs with sorrow to Sheol." "My son shall not go down (Greek future) with you, because his brother died (Greek aorist) and he alone has been left (Greek perfect). And it will turn out (Greek future) that he becomes sick (Greek aorist infinitive) on the journey that you travel (Greek present), and you will bring down (Greek future) my old age with sorrow to Hades.”

45.8: “So it was not you who sent (Hebrew perfect) me here, but God; he has made (Hebrew preterite) me a father to Pharaoh . . . ”; “Now therefore it is not you who have sent (Greek perfect) me here, but rather God, and he made (Greek aorist) me as a father to Pharaoh . . . ”

With regard to word order, where the MT and the LXX agree, I try to follow the NRSV in order to preserve the synoptic value of NETS vis-à-vis the NRSV. For example, NRSV Genesis typically reverses the Hebrew sequence of name with attributive phrase, and in NETS I follow suit. In Genesis 4.1, the NRSV has,

“Now the man knew his wife Eve” (wt#) hwx t) (dy Md)hw), and NETS reads, “Now Adam knew his wife Heua” (0Ada\m de\ e1gnw Eu[an th\n gunai=ka au)tou=). Another pattern exhibited in the NRSV is there-versal of the sequence of Hebrew first person and second or third person pronouns—especially following the preposition Nyb “between”—when the antecedent of the first person is human, but the retention of the Hebrew sequence when the first person is divine. Thus in 9.15, where (the LORD) God speaks, both the NRSV and NETS read, “I will remember my covenant that is between me and you,” following the order of the pronouns in both the MT and the LXX. In 13.8, however, Abram expresses his wish to Lot that there not be strife “between you and me” (NRSV, NETS), though in both the MT and the LXX the pronouns are reversed.

NETS follows the gender language policy adopted by the NRSV in reference to human beings. Departures from the NRSV in this regard take place when it is evident that the LXX translator has deliberately chosen to move in the direction of either greater specificity or inclusivity in comparison to what the Hebrew has. LXX Gen14.21 provides an example of the former progression, inasmuch as the king of Sodoma demands the return of “the men” (tou\j a!ndraj) whom Abram has rescued from the invading kings, whereas in the MT he wants #pnh, which the NRSV renders as “the persons.” In 24.13, the LXX translator has ensured that the Hebrew phrase ry(h y#n) “men/people of the city” is not construed in a gender-specific fashion by rendering it as tw~n Okooiu/ntwn th\n po/lin “those who live in the city.” The NRSV’s “townspeople” likewise preserves the gender-neutral sense inherent in the Hebrew term for “people,” though, unlike the LXX, without venturing beyond its normal semantic domain.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

With respect to punctuation, I have attempted to conform where possible to Wevers' edition, though I have felt free to depart from it (without acknowledging it in the notes) when that seems warranted. I have sometimes consulted the edition of Alfred Rahlfs (1935) in this regard. The following comparison of punctuation patterns in Gen 2.4-7 provides an indication of the kinds of variations that are possible.

NRSV:

4 These are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created.

In the day that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens, 5when no plant of the field was yet in the earth and no herb of the field had yet sprung up—for the LORD God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was no one to till the ground; 6but a stream would rise from the earth, and water the whole face of the ground—7then the LORD God formed man from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and the man became a living being.

My translation of Wevers' edition:

4 This is the book of the origin of heaven and earth, when it originated. On the day that God made the heaven and the earth, 5and all verdure of the field before it came to be upon the earth and all herbage of the field before it sprang up; for God had not sent rain upon the earth, and there was not a human to till the earth, 6yet a spring was rising from the earth and watering the whole face of the earth. 7And God formed man dust from the earth and breathed into his face the breath of life, and the man became a living being.

NETS (based on the editions of Rahlfs and Wevers):

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

It goes without saying that the standard Greek and Hebrew lexica and grammars have been my constant companions in the preparation of this translation. Another indispensable research tool has been the Accordance Software for Biblical Studies program (OakTree Software, Inc.). I have already made reference to my use of Wevers' critical edition and his Notes on the Greek Text of Genesis, as well as the edition by Rahlfs. My consultation of other translations of the LXX of Genesis, though their modi operandi differ significantly from those of NETS, has been fruitful. In this connection I mention the English translations of Thomson and Brenton, and the French of Marguerite Harl, La Genèse, 2nd ed.(1994) BA. Several lexicographical publications have also been of benefit to me, including John A. L. Lee, A Lexical Study of the Septuagint Version of the Pentateuch (SBLSCS 14; Chico: Scholars Press, 1983); Robert Kraft, ed., Septuagintal Lexicography (SBLSCS 1; Missoula: Scholars Press, 1972); Takamitsu Muraoka, ed., Melbourne Symposium on Septuagint Lexicography (SBLSCS 28; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990); and various articles and chapters that have appeared over the years in the BIOSCS and the Congress volumes of the IOSCS. I have gained much, as well, from interactions with other NETS translators, whether in person or via the internet. The single most important resource person for this project, however, has been Albert Pietersma, co-editor (with Benjamin Wright) of NETS. He has blazed the trail for me and other NETS translators with his publication of The Psalms and has provided us with invaluable guidance, both via the NETS Manual and his detailed communications with us throughout the various stages of our work.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation of the book of Exodus has followed the edition of the Greek text prepared by John William Wevers (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum II.1: Exodus [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1991]).

This English translation has not altered Wevers' edited Greek text of Exodus, except infrequently in relation to punctuation. Whereas one might argue for modifications in selected texts, it seemed prudent to adhere to the Göttingen edition and to postpone discussion of possible changes to Wevers' edition and treat them in the commentary on the NETS translation of Exodus under preparation.

In the account of the tabernacle (Hebrew [MT] 28.23-28; 36.8-34; 37.10b-15, 17-27), in those contexts where the Greek translation omits material in the Hebrew as we know it, Wevers inserted the Greek text as Origen constructed it. However, because these insertions are not part of the original translation, an English translation of Origen's text appears indented and in smaller typeface in the appropriate places.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

General Character

The material found in Exodus consists of narrative, poetry, legal formulation and instructions for building and operating the tabernacle. The Greek translator generally adhered closely to a form of the Hebrew text similar to the MT. From time to time, however, the Greek is longer,¹ shorter² or ordered differently.³ Reasons for such variation are not always clear, and each context requires careful evaluation. For the most part, however, the translator sought to provide a word-for-word rendering. The terms “interlinearity” or “isomorphism” appropriately describe how the translator seems to have proceeded.⁴

While the Greek is often stilted, it normally conveys the sense of the Hebrew text well, and the translator uses various approaches to bring liveliness to the text. For example, in some contexts where the same Hebrew term is used repeatedly, the translator selected different Greek terms as glosses for the same Hebrew. An interesting example is found in the genealogies of chapter 6.

sugge/nea (v. 14)

In this case the translator, presumably because he has already used a preferred term to represent one Hebrew lexeme, then selected a second Greek term to represent hxp#m. So within the space of ten verses 1 Some examples of apparent expansions:

to the reader of exodus

we find three different terms rendering hxp#m. Another example would be in 2.7 where the MT reads tqnym (“nurse”) and qnyt (“to nurse”), using the same Hebrew root. The translator chose the participle trofeu/ousan (“a nursing woman”) and qhla/sei (“she shall suckle”), two distinct terms, to gloss the same Hebrew root. This kind of lexical variation in the Greek translation occurs quite regularly, even as the translator is careful to preserve general, interlinear correspondence in his translation.

In the Hebrew narrative of Exodus the waw-conjunctive occurs frequently. The translator of Exodus normally used kai/ as the Greek equivalent. However, where a change in subject occurs or some other emphasis may be warranted, he selected de/. Aejmelaeus observes that in the case of the translation of Exodus “[c]oordination of clauses by w has been rendered by the use of various literal and free renderings, but total omission of w—disregarding the apodotic cases—is found in less than 3% of the cases, of which 3% some cases may even depend upon a difference in the Vorlage.”⁵ So the places where the translator failed to render the conjunction are rather infrequent. The translator was equally careful to render pronouns in his Hebrew text.

In the case of word order the translator tended to follow his Hebrew text, but not always slavishly. For example, in Hebrew the pronominal formations normally are attached to nouns as suffixes. We should expect the translator to place the pronoun in Greek following the noun, imitating the Hebrew order, if adherence to Hebrew word order was a significant issue. Non-translation Greek tends to place them in front. In Greek Exodus we discover that about 30 (out of approximately 350) cases are pre-posed, a proportion that is unusually high among the various Septuagint translators.

The aorist form of the verb is the most common rendering chosen by the translator for the Hebrew verb, reflecting the large number of suffixed forms or waw (w) + prefixed forms (in narrative). However, he does not hesitate to employ other Greek tense forms should that convey more adequately his understanding of the sense of his Hebrew text. An interesting example of this is found in 1.12-14. In the comparative clause structure of v. 12 the translator rendered the imperfect aspect of the Hebrew verbs well by the Greek imperfect form (“But as much as they were humbling them, by so much the more they kept becoming more numerous and stronger”). Each of the verbs that follow (vv. 12b-14) continues to use Greek imperfect forms. This tense form fit the context well, because at this point in the story the narrative reports the worsening condition of the Israelite people as they were oppressed. We also observe in this same context the translator’s use of lexical variation for the same Hebrew term: v. 13 Krpb . . . wdb(yw kai\ kateduna/steuon . . . bi/a| (imperfect tense) v. 14 Krpb . . . wdb(

katadoulou~nto . . . metbai/aj (imperfect tense)

And further his repeated use of similar formations (in this case kata- compounds), presumably for literary effect, may be noted:

v. 13-14 kateduna/steuon . . . katwdu/nwn . . .
katadoulou~nt.o

After his extensive study of the Septuagint of Exodus, Wevers comments that “the dominant characteristic of Exod as a translation document is its expansionist character. On the whole Exod expands far more than contracts.”⁶ This tendency appears in many different forms. For example, the translator is careful to define Aaron as Moses’ brother even when this is not present in the source text (cf. 7.7, 9, 19; 8.5).

At 25.6(17) the translator defined the trpk (i9lasth/rion), the gold plate placed at the top of the ark, as a “cover” (e0pi/qema), a term that has no equivalent in the Hebrew text.

Others examples could be added, but the tendency is clear. There is no indication that such clarifications are based on a different Hebrew text. Rather, these additions probably represent the translator’s efforts to ensure that his understanding of the source text would be communicated clearly and explicitly in Greek to the reader.

Of Stereotypes, Calques and Isolates

As the translator proceeded in his work, choosing appropriate terms in the target language to render adequately and contextually the sense of the source text taxed his ability. In Exodus the translator was sensitive to the Hebrew context and so did not hesitate to choose different Greek terms so that the He-5 Anneli Aejmelaeus, On the Trail of the Septuagint Translators (Kampen, the Netherlands: Kok Pharos Publishing House, 1993), 100.

brew sense, as he understood it, would be conveyed adequately. Once he connected a Greek term semantically with a Hebrew term, he tended to continue with this equivalency, unless the context led him to gloss the source text in a different way. For example, the usual rendering of rbd in Exodus is lalei=n, whereas le/gein normally renders rm). However, in one case (31.12, where there is no textual variant in the Septuagint tradition) lalei=n renders rm), and out of the three hundred occurrences of le/gein, it translates rbd about seventeen times. lalei=n would seem to constitute the default rendering of rbd. It is not clear why variation from the default occurs, but it indicates that the translator exercised some freedom.

As we have noted previously, we discover lexical variation in contexts where we would expect the usual Greek equivalent because the same Hebrew term is repeated.

Sometimes a Hebrew term will have several distinctive meanings, but the translator will use one Greek term whose semantic content only covers one of the meanings expressed by the Hebrew term. In such cases if the translator sticks with the usual equivalent, then it may create some tension in the context. An examination of the use of a(marti/a as the usual equivalent for t)+x (eleven times) and Nw( (three times) provides an interesting example. t)+x indicates both sin and the ritual associated with removing sin (i.e., sin offering). NRSV, for instance, renders it as "sin offering" at 29.14, 36; 30.10, but in all other contexts it uses "sin" (10.17; 32.21, 30, 31, 32, 34; 34.7, 9). The standard sense of a(marti/a is "failure, fault or sin.” It does not carry the sense of “sin offering.” When the translator uses a(marti/a as the stereotypical gloss for t)+x, the Greek term no longer makes sense in those contexts where t)+x signifies “sin offering.” In 29.36 where Moyses is instructed every day to “offer a bull as a sin offering for atonement”

(NRSV), the Septuagint reads kai\ to\ mosxa/rion th~v a(marti/aj poih/seij thm~

e/rah| tou~ kaqarismo(u“and

the young calf for the sin you shall do on the day of the purification” [NETS]). In these contexts a(marti/a becomes an isolate, i.e., being the default rendering for t)+x but not rendering the contextualized meaning of this Hebrew term in the context of the source language, leading to semantic tension in the Greek context (on isolates, see “TO THE READER OF NETS”).

If we move further along this lexical continuum, the calque represents the point on the semantic scale where the semantic range of the Hebrew term dominates that of the chosen Greek gloss. The use of diaqh/kh (27.21; 31.7; 39.15) as the standard equivalent for tyrb is a well-known example. Others commonly found in the Septuagint also occur in Exodus—i0dou/ for hnh, ku/rioj for hwhy and do/ca for dwbk.

At times the translator has recourse to transliteration as his only viable strategy. Some of these become standard Greek terms. These would include sa/bbata (Sabbata), pa/sxa (passover), ma/n (Man), xerou/b/xeroubi/m (cheroub/cheroubim) and terms of measurement such as go/mor and i3n.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF EXODUS

Selected Words and Phrases

1. The Bread of Presentation

The translator rendered variously the bread that God commands to be placed on the table outside the most holy part of the tent of witness, the bread of the presence. In the first three Exodus contexts where these ritual loaves are discussed, as God gives instructions to Moses for the construction of the tent of witness and Moses has it built, the MT has Mynp Mxl (25.30) or Mynph Mxl t)w (35.13; 39.36). The Septuagint renderings are various:

a!rtouj e0nwpj/ouj e0nanti/on mou (facing loaves in front of me, NETS)

(no equivalent in Septuagint)

39.18 (39.36) kai\ tou\j a!rtouj tou\j prokeime/nouj (and the presentation loaves, NETS) In Ex 40.23 (LXX 40.21) as the writer describes the placement of the table in the constructed tent of witness, the bread is placed on it but defined as Mxl Kr( (lit. “an arrangement of bread”). NRSV renders the sentence “and set the bread in order on it.” This clause is rendered by the translator: Kai\ proe/qhken e)p)au)th~j!ratouj th~j proqe/sewj e1nanti kuri/ou

(hwhy ynpl Mxl Kr(wyl(Kr(yw) (MT)

and he presented on it loaves of presentation before the Lord (NETS)

(and he set the bread in order on it before the LORD) (NRSV)

The translator did not consider the Hebrew expression to be a technical, cultic phrase, or if he did, either he felt no compulsion to render it consistently or he did not have readily to hand a Greek equivalent that had become normative for Greek-speaking Jews in Alexandria. The rendering that becomes

somewhat standard (used in Supplements [Chronicles] for example), i.e., artouj th~j proqe/sew, only occurs in the Pentateuch at Exodus at 40.21(23) and possibly 39.18(36). We do not know for sure whether the original translator devised the phrase that comes to represent the “loaves of presentation” in Greek, since it is not clear if the same person translated Ex 1-34 and 35-40. What the translator does present consistently is that these loaves were placed “before the Lord.”

2. Divine Name and General Term for Deity

The usual rendering of the tetragrammaton (hwhy) in Exodus is ku/rioj, as in the other sections of the Septuagint. Four times (3.4; 13.19; 18.1; 20.1), however, the translator uses ku/rioj to render Myhl).

Why the translator glossed Myhl) with ku/rioj is not altogether clear, but the variation does not seem to be textually based. ku/rioj as a translation of the tetragrammaton renders the qere of the Hebrew text (i.e., what the vowel marks indicate, ynd)), not the kethibh (i.e., what the consonants indicate).

Several times (4.10, 13; 5.22; 15.17; 32.22) when the author addresses God as Nwd) (“Lord” or “Master”), the translator renders it as ku/rioj. In these cases ku/rioj renders the Hebrew term appropriately. In ten contexts the translation has ku/rioj with no equivalent in the MT. Sometimes the addition seems to be for clarification (8.28; 17.15; 24.1, 16; 32.31; 34.10; 35.3; 39.12), and in the other instance the translator has apparently chosen to represent the meaning of the Hebrew text in a different way (16.32).

In 4.24 the translator has opted for a!ggeløj kuri/ou to render hwhy. Perhaps the translator did not want to attribute directly to “the Lord” this attempt on Moyses’ life. Several times the double term hwhy Myhl) was rendered by ku/riøj alone (8.10; 9.30), and hwhy alone was rendered by ku/riøj o9 qeo/j u9mw~n / sou (12.31; 13.5, 11). Whether these anomalies were textually based or occurred for some other reason is uncertain.

In the Septuagint of Exodus ku/riøj normally lacks a definite article (about 354 times in Wevers’ edition), which would indicate that the translator considered it primarily a proper name.⁷ There are fifteen occasions when the translator used the definite article with ku/riøj to represent hwhy. There does not appear to be any specific pattern.

Qeo/j usually translates Myhl) (about 129 times in Exodus). However, in 41 contexts it rendered hwhy (almost a quarter of the occurrences of qeo/j). The only occurrence of yd# l) (6.3, preposed by the preposition b) is rendered as qeo\j w2n au)tw~(n“being their God,” NETS). Several times (3.18 [2 x]; 5.3b) the translator rendered the combined Myhl) hwhy by qeo/j alone. Perhaps the translator thought that the use of ku/riøj would not be appropriate because of the way God’s personal name was being revealed to Israel (3.18), or perhaps, because Moyses was making his first appeal to Pharao (5.3b), the more generic term seemed appropriate. There are also several contexts where the Hebrew text has l) as the reference to God, and the translator normally used qeo/j as his gloss. In a number of contexts qeo/j apparently has no Hebrew equivalent, usually in conjunction with cases of ku/riøj to render hwhy.

The translator's use of qeo/j, the general term for deity (including non-Israelite deities), was more diverse than his use of his equivalent for the proper name of Israel's God. In NETS Exodus qeo/j is rendered as 'G/god' and ku/rioj as 'L/lord.' The capitalized forms refer to Israel's deity.

In Ex 3.13-14, when God appears to Moyses through the burning bush, Moyses asks God to tell him his name. The translator rendered the difficult Hebrew as)Egw& ei)mi o(w!n ("I am The One Who Is,"

NETS8). The translator repeated (14b) this expression (o(w!n = hyh)) as the name for the God of Israel, who has sent Moyses. The similar form of hwhy (proper name) and hyh (first person singular, prefix form of the Qal stem of hyh = "to be") and the corresponding etiology cannot be duplicated in Greek.

The translator opted to translate the expression, not to transliterate it in this context.

3. Pharaoh's "Hardness of Heart"

In Exodus one of the most provocative issues is the way in which Israel's God interacts with Pharaoh.

As God acts to extricate Israel from her bondage in Egypt, he influences Pharaoh's behavior. His motive is 7 Normally in Greek a proper name does not require the definite article. Sometimes, if the name is indeclinable, the definite article will be used to remove any ambiguity about the function of its noun in the clause. When the Hebrew text uses Nwd) to refer to a human "lord, owner, master," the translator consistently uses an article with the noun to indicate that it is not being used as a proper name (21.4[2 x], 5, 6[2 x], 8, 32). This same convention is used to represent l(b (21.28, 29[2 x], 34[2 x]; 22.8, 11, 12, 14, 15). There is no Hebrew equivalent to the usage at 21.36 but the Greek text uses the definite article (tw~| kuri/w| atuou~).

8 NRSV glosses the Hebrew as “I AM WHO I AM,” with several options mentioned in the footnote, namely “I AM WHAT I AM” or “I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE.”

explained in 14.4: “I will harden Pharaoh’s heart . . . so that I will gain glory for myself over Pharaoh and all his army; and the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD” (NRSV). Three Hebrew verbs are used to express this concept and the translator is quite consistent, if not stereotyped, in his renderings, with the exception of 7.13.

In these choices the translator sought to reflect the different emphases in the Hebrew terms—heaviness or weightiness in the equivalence of baru/nw for dbk and hardness in the equivalence of sklhru/nw for h#q. However, the equivalence of sklhru/nw and katisxu/w for qzx (“make strong, strengthen”) is notable, but for different reasons. In the case of sklhru/nw, the semantic overlap in Exodus with qzx focuses on the idea of firmness = stubbornness. The Hebrew term generally means, “to be strong or firm” and in the Piel form “to make strong or firm.” When related to the noun bl (“heart”), it signifies positively devotion (a firm conviction), but negatively stubbornness. sklhru/nw represents the latter in Exodus as it defines Pharaoh’s response to God’s activities through the plagues or the catastrophe at the Red Sea. If the evidence in LSJ is correct and complete, this usage of the verb sklhru/nw to signify stubbornness may have emerged initially in the Septuagint of Exodus.¹¹

The singular use of katisxu/w at 7.13 as the rendering of qzx with the sense of “prevail” is also interesting (“and the heart of Pharaoh prevailed, and he did not listen to them” [NETS]). Wevers suggests that “presumably Exod here used kati/sxusen to set the scene of the struggle between the divine signs and the stubborn heart of Pharaoh.”¹² In other words the translator purposely changed the stereotypical rendering of qzx by sklhru/nw to kati/sxusen, probably to emphasize this aspect of contest. In this context God performs the first sign through Moses and Aaron to convince Pharaoh to release Israel (the rod becoming a dragon) (7.8-13), and it follows the explanation that God provides to Moses concerning the series of events that is about to unfold and result in Israel’s release. Only in this context (7.1-13) do we find all three terms (baru/nw, sklhru/nw, katisxu/w) used to define God’s influence on Pharaoh and Pharaoh’s response to Moses’ demands as God’s representative.

4. "Seeing God"

Exodus is unusual in the narratives of the Old Testament with respect to the number of times when people, either individually or as a group, ask to "see God" or are permitted by God's initiative to see him.

In addition to the times that Moyses is invited up onto Mount Sina in order to meet with God (Moyses' face is shining after he meets with God), the pillar of cloud and fire or the cloud that descended over the newly erected tabernacle signify the presence of God with Israel, all of which reflect this emphasis upon seeing, meeting, or in some other way directly interacting with God.

Where the Hebrew text states that people "see God," the translator employs various means to express a theologically sensitive rendering, presumably preserving the theological principle that no person can see God and live. At 3.6 the comparative texts and translations read:

9 Significant manuscripts in the tradition read beba/rhtai, and Rahlfs opted for this as the original text. Wevers disagrees, arguing that the variation occurs because of homonymity, which only occurs between these verbs in the perfect form. Because bare/w does not occur elsewhere in Exodus (nor in the Septuagint other than as a variant at 2 Makk 13.9) and baru/nw is the usual rendering for dbk in Exodus, when it has this sense, Wevers opts for beba/runtai as the original reading.

10 In 10.1 there are significant Greek texts that have the alternative reading e)sklh/runa. Rahlfs chose this reading, presumably because it had the support of B. However, I think Wevers' judgment is correct that the translator's consistent use of baru/nw for dbk in reference to Pharaoh's stubbornness would urge us to accept e)ba/runa as the original text.

11 The adjective sklhro/j does signify stubbornness as early as Plato's writings, and so the extension of the cognate verb to signify this would not be exceptional, if this is in fact what the translation of Exodus initiated. See LSJ, 1612.

NETS: And Moses turned his face away, for he was afraid to look down before God.

This singular use of katemble/yai in Exodus as the rendering of +ybh^m here indicates that the translator was avoiding the implication that Moses actually “looked at,” i.e., saw, God. Wevers also notes that the preposition e0nw&pion “enhances the avoidance of directly looking at God.”¹³

After God completes his revelation of Israel’s covenantal obligations, he invites the Israelite leadership to ascend Sina and worship (24.1-2). The narrative describes this encounter (24.9-11) as an occasion when the chief men of Israel “saw the God of Israel . . . they beheld God” (NRSV). In fact they celebrated by eating a sacred meal in God’s presence. The comparative texts and translations read: MT:

NRSV: and they saw the God of Israel . . . also they beheld God

NETS: And they saw the place, there where the God of Israel stood . . . And they appeared in the place of God

The Septuagint translator would only admit that Israel's leaders saw "the place . . . where the God of Israel stood," but not that human beings saw God. He described this place in the following manner: "that which was beneath his feet, like something made from lapis lazuli brick and like the appearance of the firmament of heaven in purity." This note in the narrative may have influenced his choice to emphasize the "place" of God. The Hebrew text (v. 11) notes the expectation that seeing God should result in calamity, but God graciously restrains himself. No one is harmed through this experience. "Not even one . . .

perished," the Septuagint notes.

The other primary context comes in Ex 33-34 as Moses intercedes with God, seeking Israel's preservation from God's threatened judgment after the golden calf episode. When God promises to relent and to continue with his program to bring Israel to the land of Chanaan, Moses asks for some visible sign that God will stand by his word. Moses boldly asks to see God. "Show me your glory!" he demands (33.18). The risk in his demand becomes explicit as the narrator records God's warning that "you cannot see my face; for no one shall see me and live" (33.20). Yet God makes an accommodation for Moses' sake. While many things in this narrative context deserve comment, I will focus on 33.23.

w)ry)l ynpw yrx) t) ty)rw ypk t) ytrshw

NRSV: then I will take away my hand, and you shall see my back; but my face shall not be seen.

NETS: And I will take my hand away, and then you shall see my hind parts, but my face will not appear to you.

The translator removes any suggestion that Moses might see any significant part of God, only his

The translator’s handling of these contexts would suggest that his theological framework governed his rendering, as he sought to follow the principle (33.20) that “no one shall see me [God] and live,” at the same time dealing with segments in the narrative of Exodus that affirmed that some in Israel did see God and continued to live.

Perhaps connected with this phenomenon is the way in which the translator renders the Hebrew root d(y, which means “to appoint, meet.” When it occurs in the description of the ark and the use of the propitiatory or the tabernacle itself, God affirms to Israel that “there I will meet with you” (25.21; 29.42, 43; 30.36). However, in each of these settings the translator “quite intentionally”¹⁴ understood this root as the verb (dy, which means “to know.”

It is improbable that in all four instances the translator misread his source text or that he read a source at variance with MT. More likely, they bespeak theological sensitivity about divine involvement in human agency. The translator emphasized that God revealed himself, and this is how a “meeting” was to be understood between God and human beings. The use of ta/comai in 29.43 reinforces this idea that God’s meeting was the occasion when his commands were communicated.

5. The Ten Commandments

The translator’s rendering of the traditionally named “ten commandments” (Ex 20.1-17) was very close to the Hebrew text as we have it today. However, characteristically the Greek text is expansionist: 20.10 ο(bou~j sou katio\ u(po)zu/gio/n sou (“your ox and your draft animal”) 20.12 i3na eu] soi ge/nhtai (“so that it may be well with you”)¹⁵

Whether the different order is due to textual or other reasons is not possible to determine at this point.

One other word order change worth noting occurs in 20.17. The Septuagint places the neighbor's wife first before the neighbor's house, in contrast to the Hebrew text that places the house first, followed by the wife. Why such a reordering occurs remains a matter of speculation.

The terminology referring to the various commands that God gives to Israel tends to be stereotyped in translation. The exceptions are the term qx, which is rendered by four different terms, and hwcm, which was translated primarily by e)ntolh/, but once by pro/stagma. What nuance pro/stagma carried that made it the right choice for the translator in 20.6 is uncertain.

6. The Peoples of Chanaan

When God talks about fulfilling his promise to Abraam, Isaak and Iakob in Exodus, the land to which he will lead them is defined as belonging to specific people. In the Greek Pentateuch seven different groups are specified consistently:

[NETS 3.8, 17; 23.23; 34.11; in different order at 13.5; partial list at 23.28; 33.2]) Consistently (apart from 23.28) Gergesai/wn has been added at some point (position 4, 5 or 6) in the list, although it does not occur in the translator's Hebrew text.

7. Specific Texts

In Ex 25-31 Moses receives instructions for building the tabernacle. After the event of the Golden Calf (32-34), Moses proceeds with the construction of the "tent of witness" (35-40). Undoubtedly the account describing the construction of the tabernacle (d(wm lh)), skhnh\ tou~ marturi/ou, "tent of witness," or Nk#m/skhnh/ "tent," presents the greatest problem in Exodus to understanding the translation process.

The Greek text, when compared to the MT, is much shorter and puts various materials in a different order. Further, some indicators suggest that either the translator responsible for at least part of chapters 35-40 was different from the translator of chapters 1-34 or a later editor has substantially altered the initial translation for some reason.

Generally speaking the Greek translation describes the production of the priestly vestments (36.8-40) and then the construction of the tabernacle and its equipment (37.1-39.11), whereas the Hebrew text begins with the construction of the tabernacle and its equipment (36.8-38.31) and then describes the priestly vestments (39). But the alterations in the translation are sometimes surprising. The Greek text does not describe the making of the incense altar, for example. It abbreviates significantly passages related to the lampstand and the table of the presence. Detailed charts comparing the Hebrew and Greek texts can be found in various treatments of this problem.¹⁷ Midrashic explanation that is not found in the Hebrew text occurs at one point. The bronze for the bronze altar is said to be taken “from the bronze fire-pans that belonged to the men who revolted with the gathering of Kore” (38.22).¹⁸

16 W. Gutbrod, “no/mimoi,” in TDNT IV, 1088 notes “As a noun to\ no/mimon is ‘what is right and fair’; P. Landanae (1912/14), 16,8.”

18 The material seems to be taken from the account in Num 16.37–39 (MT: 17.2–4).

to the reader of exodus

Various hypotheses have been proposed to explain why these major differences emerged in the tradition:

1. The translator had a Hebrew text different from that which we have today, and this accounts for the variation in the Greek text. However, no Hebrew text yet discovered seems to match the Greek translation.

2. For some reason the translator of chapters 1-34 did not complete the translation and another person finished the task, who used a different translation process, while consulting the earlier material. Detailed studies of translation technique expressed in these respective sections, however, indicate only minor variations in translation techniques between these sections of Exodus, apart from chapter 38.

3. One person did the original translation of Exodus following the order of the Hebrew text as we know it, but because he misunderstood the text, or for some other reasons, he created inconsistencies in his translation. A later reviser has edited this original work, adding some materials particularly in chapter 38 and being responsible for a major rearrangement of the Greek text.

4. The original translator is responsible for the current Greek text and used specific principles as the basis for his unique account, which is a "well-planned, well-constructed account which when read by itself and without prejudice usually makes good sense."¹⁹

At this point we might suggest that the most recent comprehensive studies (1) see no need to postulate a different Hebrew text throughout chapters 35-40, (2) discern a large degree of consistency in the fundamental translation technique used throughout Greek Exodus, but (3) detect enough difference between 1-34 and 35-40 to indicate another hand may be at work in some way in the final chapters of the translation, and (4) proceed from the assumption that the original translation of 35-40 was created to make sense to the translator and his presumed audience. We have little data to inform us about the sociological aspects of translation in antiquity and in particular biblical translation. Whether it was acceptable to abbreviate portions of sacred text and make major rearrangements in the structure of the narrative remains debated. However, the fact remains, whether we postulate one translator for Ex 1-40 or several translators or editors, we have a Greek translation for this section that is quite different, being much shorter and ordered differently, from the Hebrew text that we possess today.

EDITORIAL DETAIL

NETS Exodus normally has followed the punctuation proposed in Wevers' edited text. In terms of versification, where the Septuagint differs from that of the NRSV, the NRSV versification is noted in parenthesis (cf. 18.18; 21.16, 17).

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

In addition to the standard grammars and lexica, I have received considerable assistance from the works by John William Wevers, particularly his Notes on the Greek Text of Exodus (1990) and his Text History of the Greek Exodus (1992). The translation and commentary by Alain le Boulluec and Pierre Sandevour in L'Exode BA (1989) has been helpful in many instances. The earlier translation by Brenton has also provided assistance from time to time.

Wevers' discussion of the Tabernacle section, as well as those by David Gooding in The Account of the Tabernacle: Translation and Textual Problem of the Greek Exodus (1959) and Martha Wade in Consistency of Translation Techniques in the Tabernacle Accounts of Exodus in the Old Greek (2003), have provided significant methodological and textual suggestions.

I must also acknowledge the assistance of Albert Pietersma, who provided editorial guidance and helped to resolve many translation issues.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation of Leuitikon has been based on the edition of John William Wevers (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum II.2: Leviticus [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986]). Wevers' edition is accompanied by two supplemental volumes: The Text History of the Greek Leviticus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986) and Notes on the Greek Text of Leviticus (SBLSCS 44; SBL: Atlanta, 1997). The Greek text of Leviticus from which I made the NETS translation includes the emendations to the Göttingen text suggested by Wevers in his Notes, p. 483. I record differences between the Göttingen edition and the emended text in Notes (WeN) in the NETS footnotes by the designation Weed.

THIS TRANSLATION

On Method

What I attempt in this translation is to reflect, by way of English, the translational convention at work in the mind of the Greek translator as indicated by the text he produced. The Greek Leviticus is a text that the translator constructed on the basis of how he understood his Hebrew parent text to function, in combination with what he thought that Hebrew text meant. In other words, he was accounting as best he could for Hebrew words and syntactical units while toeing the line of a peculiar translational convention.

His is not a freestanding idiomatic translation based on an understanding of the idiom of Hebrew syntactic units. Rather, his strange Greek is first and foremost a reflection of his attitude to his parent text and the force his parent text exerted on his choice of equivalents.

In the first place, then, NETS Leuitikon tries to be an English translation of a Greek translation. As the general introduction, "TO THE READER OF NETS," points out, this is the approach of NETS: to present to the English reader the two-dimensionality of the Septuagint. This text has a horizontal dimension in terms of the relation of Greek words and phrases to each other, and it has a vertical dimension in terms of its subservience to the Hebrew text(s) from which it was translated.

Meaning of Greek words

My point of departure is that Greek words are taken to mean what they meant in standard Greek of the time. Such a method helps to avoid two lexicographical pitfalls. The first is the practice of reading Hebrew meanings into Greek words on the basis of their occurrence in the LXX. The second is partially to allow the context within the LXX to determine the meaning of a Greek word/phrase used in an abnormal way. Consequently, for example, it was not possible to translate koi/th spermatoj with “sexual intercourse” as the Hebrew rz tbk# or the Greek context implies. Instead the reader will find “bed of semen.” Although koi/th alone can mean “sexual intercourse” in non-translation Greek, the phrase as we find it in Leuitikon is not so attested. The same applies to prosh&lutoj, which cannot be assumed to mean “stranger” on the basis of its pairing with Hebrew rg or its use in context. I have rather tried by the gloss “guest” to convey something of the sense of “come over as stranger.” In other words, a prosh&lutoj was deemed an outsider to the group but nonetheless accorded special treatment, not unlike the Mediterranean hospitality lavished on guests. Some Greek words are transcriptions of the source language; others were constructed from Semitic roots, e.g., pa&sxa from xsp and sabbati/zw from tb#, which have been rendered as “pascha” and “sabbatize,” respectively. Leuitikon contains no obvious calques (see “TO THE READER OF NETS”).

NATURE OF THE GREEK TRANSLATION

General Remarks

Enough detailed information on the characteristics of the language employed in the Greek Leviticus and the individual quirks of the translator can be found in Wevers' Notes. Further comment may be found to the reader of leuitikon

in the introduction of Paul Harlé and Didier Pralon's Le Levitique BA (1988). As a result, I will focus on the semantic aspects of a few of the translator's choice of words.

In general it may be said that the translator of Leuitikon, to use Albert Pietersma's words, is not "performing his translator's duty to the reader, namely, to convey the total meaning of the source text."

Rather, instead of trying to convey meaning in idiomatic Greek from larger Hebrew phrases, he works mostly from the individual Hebrew syntactical units and what individual Greek equivalents he has chosen for them. This fact is further borne out by the lack of connecting particles found in the Septuagint.

Pleonasms

The preceding description is witnessed most clearly by what are known as relative pleonasms found in the Greek rendering of the resumption of the pronoun found in Hebrew syntax. A typical Hebrew relative sentence such as Lev 15.20b $\text{)m+y wyl(b\#t r\#) lkw}$ may be translated literally: "and everything that she sits on [it] . . . shall,be unclean." The Greek translator renders the Hebrew more or less word for word as follows: $\text{kai\ pa\sim n efo\$ a@n e0pikaqi/sh| e0p au0to/, a0ka/qarton e!stai}$. I have endeavored to pass this on to the reader as follows, using the colloquial English sentence with the preposition separated from its object: "everything also which she sits down on shall be unclean."

Distributives

Among the translators of the Pentateuch it was especially the Leuitikon translator who insisted on rendering the Hebrew distributive $\#y) \#y)$ literally, and therefore woodenly, with resultant negative transfer from the source language. Thus, for example, on six occasions (17.3, 8, 10, 13; 18.6; 22.18) he translated it by $a1nqrwpoj a1nqrwpoj$ ("person by person"), once (15.2) by $a0nh\r a0nh/r$ ("man by man"), twice (22.4; 24.15) by $a1nqrwpoj$ ("a person") and once (20.2) by tij ("any one").

Some Individual Words

On the level of individual words one finds this one-to-one dependence also to be true, in most cases.

For example, the Hebrew word translated as “grain offering” in the NRSV will appear in NETS simply as “offering” because the Greek translator has chosen a general Greek term for offering as his counterpart for every occurrence of that Hebrew word. The same thing applies to the Hebrew use of “hand” in combination with other words to produce idioms. Someone whose “hand reaches” is someone who has financial means. There is a good Greek word for this, eu)pore/w, which by itself would have accounted for the Hebrew. It does indeed appear in 25.26, but the Greek translator is constrained to account in Greek for the Hebrew “hand” and therefore adds to his idiom an unnecessary item. Fortunately the English of NETS can come to the rescue with “has plenty in hand.” When in 25.35 a person becomes poor, the result is that in Hebrew one “has a shaky or slippery hand.” The Greek translator rendered this phrase by the singular and well chosen Greek term a)dunate/w, “to lack strength,” which would have sufficed to account for the Hebrew, but once again the translator’s attitude toward his parent text demanded at this point that he account also for “hands.” This same situation holds true for the Hebrew formula “to ordain,” which is “to fill the hands.” In Leuitikon (8.33; 16.32; 21.10), as also in Numbers and Exodus, the Greek translator chooses the verb teleio&w, “to complete, validate” plus “hand.” This phrase comes into NETS as “whose hand has been validated,” compared to the phrase “who has been ordained” in the NRSV, signaling that the Greek translator worked in a word-for-word manner rather than choosing an idiomatic option. Similar examples are qrau~sm,awhich NETS renders “rupture” for qtn, whereas NRSV has “itch,” and a(fh&, which NETS translates “attack” for (gn, while NRSV has “disease.”

Cultic Terminology

In rendering Hebrew cultic terminology into Greek, there seems to be certainty about some kinds of sacrifices but not about others. For instance we find that for the Hebrew words ת) + x “sin/sin offering” and מ#) “guilt/guilt offering,” the Greek counterparts are always the same, i.e., α(marti/a and πlhmmē/leia.

They are rendered in NETS by “sin” and “error,” respectively. But for the Hebrew “wave offering,” חפwn, there are four different Greek equivalents: δo/ma, α)faí/rema (also used for the Hebrew חmwrt, NRSV “offering”), ε)pi/qema and α)fo/risma. Its cognate verb חפwn (Hiphil) also has four different Greek equivalents: ε)pití/qhmi, α)faíre/w, α)fori/zw and α)nafe/rw. In these instances the Greek equivalents do not approximate the meaning of the Hebrew. It could be that by the time this translation was made, all but certain kinds of sacrifices had lost their meaning to the translator.

Consistency

The words “mostly” and “in most cases” used above for the translator’s modus operandi are important, because the Leuitikon translator is not consistent in the way he goes about things. Even though in most cases he works atomistically, ignoring Greek idiom, the odd exception occurs. In this he is quite distinct from the translators of Deuteronomy and Exodus, for example. This circumstance can be illustrated by the comparative “than,” which in Hebrew is expressed by the word “from” (Nm). Commonly the translator will choose his standard preposition for the Hebrew “from” and construct a barely intelligible Greek sentence, e.g., 13.3 $\tau\alpha\pi\epsilon\iota\eta\ \alpha\pi\omicron\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \sim\ \delta\epsilon\ /r\ m\alpha\tau\omicron\ N\jmath\text{ETS}$: “low in the skin,” cf. NRSV “deeper than the skin.”

But occasionally he decides instead to employ the standard Greek idiomatic expression for the same Hebrew, e.g., 13.30, 31 $\epsilon\gamma\kappa\omicron\iota\lambda\omicron\tau\epsilon /r\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \sim\ \delta\epsilon\ /r\ m\alpha\tau\omicron\ N\jmath\text{ETS}$: “more hollow than the skin.”

The standard explanations that try to account for the inconsistency in Leuitikon do not do justice to the complexity of this book. If it appears that his poor Greek usage may provide one clue, one could put forward equal evidence of his grammar and choice of translation equivalents being of a decent standard.

Variation for the sake of creativity also does not satisfy as an explanation because there are enough instances of blatant un-creativity to persuade one otherwise. Leuitikon may thus be said to have many faces.

Interlinearity as an Explanatory Model for Inconsistency

The interlinear model developed by Albert Pietersma does offer a plausible explanation in that it points to the two-dimensionality of the text.¹ The translator worked in small bits at a time. His Greek syntactic units, at any given instance, were subject to interference from the parent text, but this interference happens to a greater or lesser degree from moment to moment. There is therefore a lack of semantic coherence at times but also a lack of systematization. The result is that we have a disordered text and a text that is episodic in its nature. The lack of semantic coherence is attributable to the interference from the parent text, but not in all instances. Other factors that produce inconsistency such as changes in number and person are difficult to explain due to our ignorance of the exact form of the translator's source text and whether the translator ever made changes on his own initiative.

NETS AND THE NRSV

The procedure followed in my translation was always to start with the NRSV and then to alter it insofar as it did not represent the Greek or the differences between the Hebrew and the Greek. So the reader should as a rule of thumb expect NETS to reveal the differences between the Greek and the Hebrew from a synoptic point of view. Occasionally this will be overridden by the need to point out the force of the Hebrew upon the Greek, as in the occurrence of “and” or other particles that are the equivalent of Hebrew w. Thus the appearance of “and” in NETS without a corresponding equivalent in NRSV will not always signal that there is an addition in the Greek. Deviations from the NRSV may therefore occur both for reasons of meaning and of style.

In NETS the actions at the altar will appear quite different from the NRSV. Often the verbs in the Greek are unrelated to the action expressed in Hebrew. Also the verbs in Hebrew would frequently have a verbal suffix or the object marker plus suffix, whereas the Greek would have none. Although an assumed objective pronoun might be standard practice in Greek, this absence of “it” or “them” will appear in NETS to distinguish these cases from the times when the objective pronoun does appear in the Greek. Thus one would find in NETS “the priest shall do the presenting” (1.15). But when neither the Hebrew nor the Greek have the objective pronoun, but NRSV does include it for the sake of style, then it will appear in NETS, e.g., “he will lay it” (2.9).

Sometimes the English of NETS unavoidably misrepresents the Greek. For example in chapter 4 and 7.10, where I have rendered yuxh& (f) by “soul,” the personal pronouns “she”

or “her” that follow will be rendered by “him” or “his” in NETS.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Albert Pietersma, who is the driving force behind the NETS project, has given much of his time to devote personal attention to me and the problems raised by this difficult book. I am pleased to acknowledge his valuable advice and criticism. Leonora Jackson was a great help in the more difficult chapters.

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of Numbers is based on the critical edition prepared by John William Wevers (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum III.1: Numeri [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982]). In addition, several of the thirty-five changes to the critical text later proposed by Wevers in his Notes on the Greek Text of Numbers ([SBLSCS 46; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998] 608–609) have been incorporated into NETS Numbers where these alterations affect the English translation. In such cases, differences between the critical edition (Weed) and the emended text of Wevers' Notes (WeN) are evident in the footnotes to NETS. For example, in Num 21.11 the translation reads “and camped in bAchel Gaib,” although the edition has “and camped in Achelgai.” The correction of the Notes is cited at the foot of the page as follows: b Achelgai = Weed.

Character of the Translation

LXX Numbers may be described as quite a literal reproduction of the Hebrew that is often wooden.

The translator is at times careless or inaccurate, but he can also be skillful in carrying out his task, with successful attempts to achieve consistency and to harmonize passages he is rendering.

In his 1851 analysis of LXX Numbers as a translation,¹ Zacharias Frankel came to the conclusion that it is a chance amalgam without an overall plan or purpose. However, in his Notes on the Greek Text of Numbers, which constitutes the most thorough study of LXX Numbers in modern times, Wevers offers a more balanced assessment.

On the one hand, Wevers considers the Greek translation of Numbers as “without a doubt by far the weakest volume in the Greek Pentateuch” (Notes, p. ix), with numerous examples of incompetence evidenced by gross failures to follow the rules of grammar. On the other, he also views LXX Numbers as the product of “a mind at work, making judgments at times quite astute in its approach to the task of translating holy writ” (Notes, p. xv). Despite his flaws, the translator is actively engaged in the interpretation of Scripture, making strong efforts to clarify obscure passages and sometimes even to correct what he perceives as factual errors or contradictions in the parent text.

Carelessness and Grammatical Inconsistencies

There are many apparent careless renditions and grammatical inconsistencies on the part of the translator.

A striking example of carelessness on the translator's part is at Num 9.22-23, where he omitted two pieces of the text due to homoioteleuton (i.e., his eye skipping from one Hebrew word to the same word later in the text, resulting in the omission of the words in between). In the MT, 9.22 ends with

“[the Israelites] would not set out; but when it [i.e., the cloud] lifted they would set out,”

(w(sy wtl(hbw w(sy)lw), and v. 23 continues: “At the command of the LORD (hwhy yp l()) they would camp, and at the command of the LORD (hwhy yp l(w) they would set out.” LXX Numbers, however, simply reads “[the sons of Israel] . . . shall certainly not set out (kai\ ou0 mh\ a0pa/rwsin). (23) For at the ordinance of the Lord they shall set out” (o#ti dia\ prosta/gmatoj kuri/ou a0parou=sin). In these two verses, the translator's eye most likely skipped from the first “[they] would set out” to the second, resulting in loss of the intervening text (“but when it lifted” in the MT). In similar fashion, his eye seems to have skipped from the first “at the command of the LORD” to the second, resulting in loss of the intervening text (“they would camp” in the MT).

Another example of carelessness is at Num 3.25, where the translator unfortunately uses sknh/ for both Nk#mh and lh), which gives rise to confusion, since the Hebrew here uses them coordinately: “And 1 Z. Frankel, Ueber den Einfluss der palästinischen Exegese auf die alexandrinische Hermeneutik (Leipzig, 1851).

the guard duty of the sons of Gedson in the tent (th|=sknh|=) of witness is the tent (i.e., the tabernacle) (h9 sknh/) and the screen.”

Several grammatical inconsistencies are also evident. For example, we find cases where no grammatically fitting antecedent can be found in the context. Thus at 11.10 we read “and before Moyses it was evil,” although there is no neuter singular word nearby. We can only presume that Moyses found it evil to hear the people weeping in their divisions, each one at his door. At 22.5 Balak sent ambassadors to Balaam son of Beor “of Pathoura, which is on the river.” The translator presumably regards Pathoura as the name of a city, which would normally be feminine. However, he then refers to this noun with a relative neuter pronoun (o3 e0stin, “which is”).

Formulaic Patterns

A more positive view of the translator arises when other aspects of his technique are taken into account. In Num 1.2-46, for example, he shows his preference for rigidly following formulaic patterns, regardless of changes in the parent text: “according to their families, according to their divisions , according to their paternal houses, according to the number of their names, according to their head, every male from twenty years and above, everyone who goes out in the force.”

On occasion, a mini-pattern emerges when the translator’s work is compared with the Hebrew of the MT. Num 4.41, for example, ends with a phrase: “(whom Moyses and Aaron enrolled by the voice of the Lord) by the hand of Moyses.” Although not found in the MT, “by the hand of Moyses” has apparently been added in conformity to formulas found elsewhere in this chapter (cf. vv. 37, 45, 49).

Consistency and Harmonization

On numerous occasions, the translator's attempts to achieve consistency are evident. At Num 21.3, for example, he makes the account consistent with v. 2, which read: "And Israel vowed a vow to the Lord and said: 'If you deliver to me this people as subject, I will anathematize it and its towns.'" In the MT, however, v. 3 reads: "and they utterly destroyed them and their towns." LXX Numbers makes this verse consistent with the vow in v. 2 by stating: "and he anathematized him and his cities to destruction." The translator also tries to level the text by the use of harmonizations. In Num 27.18, for example, Moyses is ordered to take Iesus as his successor, "and you shall lay your hands (ta\j xei=ra/j sou) upon him"—the Hebrew here has the singular "your hand" (Kdy t)). A few verses later, this command is carried out when Moyses "laid his hands (wydy t)) upon him." In the earlier verse the translator used the plural "your hands" in order to harmonize the readings in vv. 18 and 23. Thus, while attempting to translate the Hebrew parent text faithfully, the Greek translator did not hesitate to change specific details in order to achieve consistency and harmonization.

Standard Equivalents and Calques

As is the case for many other books of the Septuagint, LXX Numbers presents several standard equivalents for Hebrew terms. Some examples evident in LXX Numbers are found elsewhere in the Pentateuch; for example: diagh/kh (“covenant”) for tyrb and yuxh/ (“soul/ spirit”) for #pn. More specific to Numbers are proskune/w (“bow down/worship”) for hwxt#h Hithpael; parabolh/ (“illustration”) for l#m; ui9oi/ (“sons”) for ynb (construct state in chapter 26); xi/mairon e0c ai0gw~(n“male goat from the goats”) for Myz(ry(#; a0poskeuh/ (“chattel”) for P+; and du/namij (“army/force”) for lyx.

Another feature of LXX Numbers is the translator’s use of calques, i.e., Greek words with Hebrew meanings, or which at least incorporate meanings from the Hebrew parent text (see “TO THE READER

OF NETS”). One prominent example of a calque is ku/rioj (“LORD”) for the Hebrew hwhy. Another is diagh/kh (“covenant”) for tyrb, which is also classified as a standard equivalent (see above).

Translation of Difficult Terms

In several cases, the translator of LXX Numbers was faced with difficult or baffling Hebrew terms, and he did his best to render them in an intelligible manner. Five examples are presented here.

Even today there is some disagreement among scholars as to the precise meaning of lechem in Num 11.8; our translator simply contextualized by rendering lechem (“cake”).

The puzzling words chafim—possibly meaning “my displeasure”—are found in Num 14.34 (see also Job 33.10). Here LXX Numbers gives a contextualized translation, chafim (“the wrath of my anger”), which makes good contextual sense.

The Hebrew term gibborim (“high places”) was apparently not understood as an idolatrous place of worship at Alexandria when the translator did his work. In Numbers it is rendered by sth/lai (“steles”) at 21.28; 22.41; 33.52 (thus also Leu 26.20).

In Num 23.14 the Hebrew text tells us that Balak brought Balaam Mypc hd# (“to the field of Zo-phim”). Since Mypc literally means “watchers,” the translator rendered the phrase by ei0j a0grou= skopia/n (“to a look-out [or, watchtower] of a field”).

In Num 32.33 the land of Og is called by bs Cr)h yr(tlbgb hyr(l Cr)h. The difficulty of providing an accurate translation is evident when the NRSV (“the land and its towns, with the territories of the surrounding towns”) is compared with the more literal Authorized Version (“the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about”). The Greek translator made reasonable sense of the Hebrew by rendering th\ n gh= n kai\ ta\ j po/leij su\ n toi= j o9ri/oij au0th= j, po/leij th= j gh= j ku/klw (“the land and the cities, together with its borders, cities of the land round about”).

Major Differences in Arrangement or Structure

When LXX Numbers is compared with the MT, several variations in arrangement or structure are evident. Besides affecting verse numbering, which complicates a synoptic reading with the MT, such differences affect exegesis of the sections in which they are found, and in some cases they might affect our understanding of the textual development of the book of Numbers.

First, in the pedigree (MT “census”) of Israel found in Numbers 1, vv. 20–37 deal with the descendants of Jacob’s twelve sons in the following order: Rouben, Symeon, Ioudas, Issachar, Zaboulon, Ephraim (Ioseph’s son), Manasse (Ioseph’s son), Benjamin, Gad, Dan, Aser, and Naphtali. In contrast, the MT covers them in the order of: Reuben, Simeon, Gad, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Ephraim (Joseph’s son), Manasseh (Joseph’s son), Benjamin, Dan, Asher, and Naphtali. The effect of the sequence in the LXX is to bring Gad into proximity with Aser (ninth and eleventh, respectively), whereas in the MT they are far apart (third and eleventh). This phenomenon is even more striking in the pedigree detailed in Num 26.5–50, where in the MT Gad is third and Asher seventh. In LXX Numbers, however, Gad is sixth and Aser is seventh. An explanation or motivation for the close proximity of Gad and Aser in the two LXX pedigrees is to be found in the list of Num 1.5–15, where Aser is tenth and Gad is eleventh (in both the MT and LXX).

Second, the arrangement of the Priestly Benediction in Num 6.22–27 differs from that in the MT: (22) And the Lord spoke to Moses, saying: (23) Speak to Aaron and his sons, saying: Thus you shall bless the sons of Israel, saying to them— 24(27 MT) and they shall put my name on the sons of Israel, and I the Lord will bless them—25(24 MT) May the Lord bless you and keep you; 26(25 MT) may the Lord make his face shine upon you and show mercy to you; 27(26 MT) may the Lord lift up his face upon you and give you peace.

The final passage involves another pedigree (MT “census”), this time of the new generation who will live on to conquer the Promised Land. In the Greek, 26.15–47 mention the following descendants of nine of Jacob’s sons: Ioudas, Issachar, Zaboulon, Gad, Aser, Manasse (Ioseph’s son), Ephraim (Ioseph’s son), Benjamin, and Dan. In the MT, however, the order is somewhat different (equivalent to 26.19-27, 15-18, 44-47, 28-43 in the LXX): Gad, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Manasseh (Joseph's son), Ephraim (Joseph's son), Benjamin, Dan, and Asher.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF NUMBERS

Policy on Gender Language and Translating in a Literal Manner

NETS generally follows the gender language policy adopted by the NRSV with respect to human beings. However, departures from the NRSV in this regard are quite common in NETS Numbers, for two main reasons. First, the translation presented here is quite literal, in an attempt to reflect the Greek relationship to its source. Second, in accordance with its stated goal with respect to gender, the NRSV sometimes avoids terms that are clearly masculine in the Hebrew, substituting instead ones that are more neutral. This course has generally not been followed in the NETS translation.

The challenges presented and decisions made are illustrated in Num 1.2. Here NETS reads: "Take a sum total of the whole congregation of the sons of Israel (NRSV: "of Israelites"), according to their families, according to their paternal houses (NRSV: "by ancestral houses")." The Greek translator rendered $\text{I}r\#y\ ynb$ with $\text{ui9oi}\ \text{I)srah/I}$ ("the sons of Israel") and Mtb)\ tybl with $\text{kat)\ oi!kouj\ patriw=n\ au0tw=n}$ ("according the houses of their paternal families"). While the more literal renderings given here do not accord with the NRSV's policy with respect to gender neutral language, for this verse and many like it the NETS Numbers is based on the overriding principle of translating what the Greek actually says.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

As indicated above, the New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS) version of Numbers is based on John W. Wevers' critical edition with frequent reference to his Notes on the Greek Text of Numbers. I have also consulted the earlier edition by Alfred Rahlfs (1935). A most helpful research tool has been the Accordance Software for Biblical Studies program (produced by OakTree Software, Inc.). The standard English translation by Brenton has provided many valuable insights. Various scholarly articles in the BIOSCS and some chapters in the Congress volumes of the IOSCS have also provided relevant information and cogent insights.

Personal discussions and interactions with other NETS translators—especially those translating the other four books of the Pentateuch—have been instructive and illuminating.

I especially acknowledge the expert help and input of Albert Pietersma, co-editor (with Benjamin Wright) of the NETS project. By publishing the first translation in the NETS project (The Psalms) as well as the NETS Manual, Professor Pietersma has produced a paradigm and a roadmap for the other translators to follow, each, of course, with his or her own adaptations. Above all, I am most grateful to this leader and mentor in our field for providing detailed communications with me and the other translators as we worked and for helping me avoid several pitfalls by checking this translation with care and in detail.

DEUTERONOMION

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation of Deuteronomion has been based on the edition by John William Wevers (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academiae Scientiarum Gottingensis editum III.2: Deuteronomium [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977]). This fully critical edition is the best available. Its printed text was modified only where Wevers himself, in Appendix A of his Notes on the Greek Text of Deuteronomy (SBLSCS 39; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995), proposed that changes be made. Most of the forty-four suggested modifications involve matters of punctuation or accentuation. Others consist of variation in pronouns due to itacisms (u9mw~n/h9mw~n, etc.), changes in the form of n t o h m e ina sacra, the odd omission of a possessive or a copula and so on. Only a single reading in the list (the metathesis of lambda and alpha in lao/n 28.9) was a genuine printing error. But in one or two cases such as 28.62 or 30.13, readings that the editor initially considered secondary and therefore placed in the apparatus, he deemed on further reflection to be primary. In every instance, such changes that can be shown are noted in the brief apparatus to NETS Deuteronomion, where WeN is made to contrast with Weed.

General Comment

The aim here is not to present a complete picture of the character of the translation of Greek Deuteronomy within the constraints of a brief introduction. What follows, rather, is a discussion of some features that might interest the NETS reader conversant with Hebrew and Greek and interested in the relationship of the latter to the former. It may be assumed that the translator of Greek Deuteronomy (hereafter DeutTr) had before him a text similar in the main to the printed text of BHS and that the printed text of Weed (as modified by WeN) is representative of the original Greek translation.

Every translation must be examined, of course, for its own peculiarities, and each translator evaluated in relation to the content of the material on which he worked. Statistical representations are relevant only when judged against patterns and practices of a particular translator and the choices he faced. Deuteronomy is noted for its hortatory style and repetitive content. Thus its study, even though tedious, can be instructive to a textual critic evaluating whether and when formulaic expressions are accurately transmitted. But Deuteronomy also repeats legal material found in earlier books of the Pentateuch and contains more sustained poetry than any of the others. Furthermore, if we assume that the Pentateuch was translated sequentially, Deuteronomy, given its position, might reflect knowledge of the work of previous translators, and so we might look for evidence along those lines. These factors add a unique dimension to the task of evaluating Greek Deuteronomy. It is fair to say that DeutTr typically maintains a very close relationship to his source text, though, within a linguistically rather constricting framework, one can nevertheless speak of an interpretative dimension. I discuss each aspect in turn.

Formal Correspondence and Representation

The indicators of a close connection between a Greek translation and a Hebrew source text are well established. Some are attested throughout the Pentateuch, others in the larger corpus of LXX translation Greek and even in the NT. These include for example: fixed lexical equivalents on the content side (verbs and nouns) and even non-content elements—particles, prepositions and the like; the use of le/gwn as a consistent translation for rm)l; o3ti as a translation for yk irrespective of contextual concerns; b for e0n; the use of a Greek conjunctive participle with a cognate finite verb to represent the Hebrew free infinitive (absolute) used for emphasis before a cognate finite verb; the (related) practice of using a participle plus finite verb to represent two successive Hebrew verbs describing the same or related activity; e0n tw~ infinitive + pronoun for b + bound infinitive (construct); the ubiquitous kai/ for w even in places where standard Greek would opt for postpositive de/ and so forth. Beyond these lie matters of quantitative representation—the tendency to represent one word in Hebrew by one in Greek as far as possible, often

to the reader of deuteronomion

down to the morphemic level—and matters of strict adherence to Hebrew word order at the expense of standard Greek style.

A translation that conforms regularly to these patterns exhibits formal correspondence with its source text—the conventions and demands of that source being dominant throughout. One that takes seriously the needs and expectations of the reader—the target audience—might be expected to deviate from these patterns regularly and demonstrate what is termed dynamic equivalence. Few translations exhibit one or the other pattern exclusively; Deuteronomion is no different in this respect. Each of the above examples of formal correspondence can be demonstrated, though some are more worthy of attention than others. I discuss a few below.

The first chapter should provide representative examples since it would presumably show DeutTr's initial approach to his task. Indeed, a look at the very first verse demonstrates a number of DeutTr's characteristic features. One will note: (1) an almost isomorphic relationship to the source text; (2) identical word order to the source text; (3) occasional translation of names; (4) at times excessive focus on individual items; (5) a certain freedom vis-à-vis the source text.

DeutTr selected pe/ran to represent rb(b and maintained it throughout the book even though he seemed unsure at that stage whether the b should be represented discretely or not; by verse 5 he has decided that it should be, since there (and in 3.20, 4.46) he preceded pe/ran with e0n tw|~. In all but two (30.13 2 x) of thirteen places, the reference is to the Jordan. The preposition lwOm here is a hapax as pointed in BHS; its variant form lw%m occurs rarely in BHS and only four more times in Deuteronomy (2.19; 3.29; 4.46; 34.6). Of course, it cannot be known whether or not DeutTr read his unpointed text just as the Masoretes did, since the meaning of both forms of the preposition remains the same. It may be entirely coincidental but noteworthy, however, that only in 1.1, where the variant Masoretic vocalization appears, does plhsi/on appear and there in relation to the Red Sea. But plhsi/on is never used again as a translation of lw%m; by the time DeutTr next encountered it in 2.19, he had decided that e1gguj or su/neg-guj = lw%m and that either pe/ran or e0n tw~ pe/ra=nr(b. Thus, by 4.46 when rb(b and lw%m appear in the same verse, he rendered them e0n tw|~ pe/ran tou0lorda/nou, . . . e1gguj oi1kou Fogw/r “beyond the Jordan . . . near the house of Phogor.” The variation in the gloss for lw%m, however, can be accounted for on contextual grounds. Towards the end of the first verse, DeutTr seemed confident that Pharan, Tophol, and Lobon were place names because they were clearly set off by Nyb, even though the second is left untranslated (cf. infra), but he seems unsure that trcx and bhz yd were. He therefore translated them as faithfully as he could—Au0lw~“nCourts” and Kataxru/sea “Goldplaces.” Oddly, though, the last named is in the wrong case to be a constituent of the preceding series. Consequently, it dangles rather uncertainly at the end.

One well-established marker of a translator’s dependence on his source is the treatment of clause connectors. A. Aejmelaeus has noted the importance of this issue in several publications.¹ If a translator selected o3ti instead of ga/r (even when standard Greek style would suggest the latter) to render yk, it is one of many signs that the source text controlled the process. She cites 4.6 “because this is your wisdom,” 16.3 “because you came out . . . in haste,” and 22.5 “for anyone doing these things is an abhorrence to the Lord your God,” and especially 30.11 ο#τι η(ε0ntolh_ au3th, h4n e0gw_ e0nte/l omai/ soi sh/meron=

NETS: “because this commandment that I command you today” as examples where the ο3τι stands first in its clause under Hebrew influence but a postpositive ga/r would seem perfectly warranted in the contexts.

Another clear example of DeutTr’s heavy dependence on the source is his literal rendering of pleonastic expressions —“the land which you are crossing the Jordan there to inherit it.” This type of syntactical structure is typical and frequent in Deuteronomion. Full lexeme-for-lexeme representation is always evident in Greek. Likewise, free infinitives are juxtaposed before or after cognate verbs frequently in Deuteronomion. DeutTr made no attempt to interpret the sense of such Hebraistic expressions but rendered them quite literally, word for word, striving to imitate his source text by utilizing cognate roots in Greek. Singular and plural forms of address in Hebrew are almost religiously followed in Greek, and the few variations can usually be explained reasonably.

Neologisms

Throughout Deuteronomion one finds new words (neologisms) or instances of known words combined in new ways. Some are unique to the Pentateuch; almost forty appear for the first time in 1 See for example her collection of essays on this subject On the Trail of the Septuagint Translators (Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos, 1993) and particularly the essays on OTI.

Deuteronomion. These illustrate certain decisions DeutTr made when confronting Hebrew expressions for which he knew of no Greek equivalent quite close enough to his source text. For example, a Hebrew root may have only a noun equivalent in Greek but no verb equivalent. As a result, a translator, if he is intent on matching the source text word class for word class, might need to coin a Greek verb. So, while coining a neologism may reflect literary creativity, it can equally well indicate rigid adherence to the source text. The vast majority of DeutTr's creations are best placed in the latter category.

The noun Myr+# occurs less than ten times in the book, the first being in 1.15. In this context it describes specific officials connected to judges. Rather than replacing the Hebrew with a contextually suitable Greek term, DeutTr apparently coined a word by fusing two known Greek functionaries: a gramma-teu/j "a scribe" and an ei0sagwgeu/j "one who brings cases to court" into grammatoeisagwgeu/j "one who records things for judges." He also used it elsewhere (16.18; 29.10; 31.28), but in three other places (20.5, 8, 9) he rendered Myr+# more simply as grammatei~ "jscribes."

The idiom "to be long of days," Mymy Kyr), is variously translated by poluxroni/zw "to prolong time"

(4.26), makroh/meroj/-reu/w "to have long days" (4.40; 5.33; 6.2; 11.9; 32.47) or makroxroni/zw "to have a long time" (17.20) and so on. Components of these words were already in use. For example, the adjective poluxro/nioj rendering the same Hebrew occurs in Gen 26.8. What

DeutTr does in these instances then is make a verb out of a known adjective as a way of remaining close to the source text without being too slavishly literal.

The neologism deuterono/mion itself provides a final example. Neither deu/teroj nor no/moj were new Greek words. With the suffixing of -ion, however, they together constituted an interpretation, not simply a translation of hrwth hn#m in 17.18 that in time was adopted as the name of the book. The Hebrew phrase could be understood as describing either a copy, a repetition of or another, a second, law. This latter sense is clearly the intent of DeutTr; he makes this even more explicit in 31.26 by speaking of “the book of this law” rather than of “this book of the law” (=MT). “This law” seems in his mind to stand in contrast to the first law (Exodus-Numbers).

Dynamic Equivalence and Interpretation

All the foregoing notwithstanding, DeutTr often shows that he is not invariably wedded to formal correspondence, at least not to a rigid one-to-one equivalency. Accordingly, one finds in DeutTr both semantic leveling (the use of one Greek word for several in Hebrew) and semantic differentiation (the use of two or more Greek words to render the same Hebrew). I discuss a few examples of each.

DeutTr had previously translated the simple verb $\text{׀}\#n$ “to lift up” by fe/rw “to bear/carry,” but in 1.31

he contextualized its meaning by choosing trofofore/w “to nurse.” He seems to have had in mind the image of the people of Israel being nurtured by their god with food in the desert, as analogous to a father nursing his son to adulthood, presumably in difficult circumstances. The noun spe/rma(ta) regularly translates rz but also Nb (25.5). The very popular verb e0coleqreu/w translates six Hebrew roots — $\#ry$ 5 x (4.38; 7.17; 9.4, 5; 18.12); Mrx 3 x (2.34; 3.6 2 x); db , 2 x (7.10; 28.63); $\text{tx}\#$ 4 x (9.26; 10.10; 20.19; 20.20); trk (12.29); $\text{dm}\#$ 18 x.

As for semantic differentiation, DeutTr offers numerous examples; his treatment of rg is representative. The default rendering prosh/lutoj describes in the Pentateuch and certainly in Deuteronomion someone clearly not yet a proselyte, a convert, but more like a guest of the community who receives preferential treatment alongside the orphan and the widow. He should be treated fairly and paid a just wage.

That he is an outsider is not in doubt. But he is not just any passing outsider, nor as yet fully an insider.

He has “come over” to the community and is treated as its guest, with all the privileges that such a status implied. However, DeutTr also used pa/roikoj for rg in two instances (14.20 [21] and 23.7[8]) to describe someone who is not a permanent resident and does not enjoy special privileges. By differentiating, he evidently intended to highlight a distinction.

The word yrp (NRSV: “fruit”) modifies nouns three times in 28.4 and 30.9, and twice in 7.13 and 28.11. In 28.4, it becomes e1kgona, genh/mata, bouko/lia (NETS: “progeny,” “produce,” “herds”), whereas in 30.9 e1kgona, genh/mata, e1kgona (NETS: “progeny,” “produce,” “progeny”). In 7.13 it becomes e1kgona and ka/rpon (NETS: “progeny” and “fruit”), while in 28.11 it is e1kgona, e1kgona (NETS: “progeny, progeny”). Thus one Hebrew word yrp is rendered in this small sample by four Greek words, in view of the difference in semantic range between Hebrew yrp and Greek ka/rpoj (its most common equivalent throughout the LXX).

Though DeutTr at times “solved” problems in his source text, he also sometimes unwittingly created problems that the source text did not have. So, for example, in 1.43 he chose parabiazomai “to act forcefully” to translate dyz “to act with arrogance.” But since the context clearly speaks of obedience to God’s word transmitted by Moyses, parabia/zomai is scarcely an obvious fit. (Note that in 17.13 and 18.20 he uses a0sebe/w.).

The entire verse in 19.3 may be an example of contextual interpretation. Three separate Hebrew verbs are rendered in unusual ways vis-à-vis the text of BHS. Hebrew Nykt (imperfect of Nwk) “you must prepare” is read differently from the Masoretes as an imperative of a root Nkt (as P. Dion has suggested² and as the NRSV has adopted) and becomes in Greek sto/xasai “estimate for yourself.” DeutTr may have misread or interpreted a text like the Masoretic text, but it seems more probable that Nkt was in his Vorlage.

The verb t#l# “you will make three of” is more explicitly rendered as trimeriei~“jyou shall make (or divide) into three portions.” The very popular verb lxn (Hiphil) “to give as a possession/inheritance,” usually translated as klhronome/w, is only in this context translated as katameri/zw “to divide into sections/to apportion.” Either by design or by inadvertence DeutTr ends up with a verbal repetition: trimeri/zw . . . kata-meri/zw.

DeutTr made explicit that when (as in 13.5[6]; 17.7, 12; 19.19; 21.21; 22.21, 22, 24; 24.7) the source text suggests, ambiguously, that (rh “the evil” is to be removed from among the people of Israel, evil is to be understood concretely. For him, it is the evil person to\n ponhro/n, not evil as an abstraction to ponhro/n that is the intent of the source; that person must be removed.

In terms of style, he usually utilized classical reflexive pronouns when speaking of the extirpation of these community evildoers; see for example 13.5[6]; 19.19; 21.21; 22.21, 24; 24.7. In these cases, the selection of e0c u(mw~n au)t~ wrnather than e0c eautw~“nfrom among yourselves” or even of e0c umw~“nfrom you” may possibly signal a heightened sense of outrage, but more likely is indicative of the relatively early date of Deuteronomion.

DeutTr judged the expression in 10.16, Mkbbl tlr(“the foreskin of your heart,” perhaps too graphic and made a moral/theological judgment to render it as sklhrokardi/an umw~“nyour hardheartedness.”

It is also quite clear that he deliberately sought to avoid translating Klm as basileu/j when the referent could possibly be construed as a king of Israel. In those five instances (17.14, 15(2x); 28.36; 33.5), he chose the word a1rxwn “ruler.” For him, it seems there could only be one basileu/j in Israel and that would be ku/rioj their god.

These brief comments should suffice to demonstrate that DeutTr was, on the one hand, a translator who often slavishly mimicked his source text but who, on the other hand, from time to time slipped in some exegesis. He does not make unwarranted changes, but when he deems them necessary, he does not hesitate to act.

ISSUES OF THE PARENT TEXT

We turn now to examples of variance between Greek and Hebrew Deuteronomy whether occasioned by misreading, misunderstanding or, as seems clear in a few places, a source text different from BHS. The well-known “shema” in 6.4 consists in Hebrew of six words. In Greek the verse is prefaced with: Kai\ tau~ta ta\ dikaiw/mata katia\ kri/mata, o#sa e0netei/lato ku/rioj toi~j (oui~j 0Israh/l e0n e0celqo/ntwn au0tw~n0k egh~j t~ ui wptou “And these are the statutes and the judgments, which the Lord commanded to the sons of Israel in the wilderness as they were coming out from the land of Egypt.”

Given DeutTr’s preoccupation with quantitative representation of his source in undisputed areas, there is no reason to think that the Hebrew equivalent of this passage was absent from his Vorlage. The initial introductory remarks in 6.1 in the Greek tradition are directed to Moyses;
those in 6.4 to the sons of Israel.

The case in 30.15, 16 is similar but less debatable. The Hebrew of BHS is both illogical and deficient, the Greek quite clear. Hebrew verse 15 indicates that what Moses set before the people was “the life and the good, the death and the evil.” The following verse begins with r#), the logical antecedent of which is (rh. As the text stands, it would be translated “the evil (16) which I command you today to love the Lord your God”—clearly an untenable text. The Greek reads: 0ldou\ de/dwka pro\ prosw&pou sou sh/meron th\n zwh\n kai\ to\n qa/naton, to\ a0gaqo\n kai\ to\ kako/n. 16.

to the commandments of the Lord your God that I command you today, to love the Lord your God.” Though it might be argued in this and other places that the smoother text derives from an attempt to correct the perceived difficulty in the original, that 2 “Deuteronomy 19:3 Prepare the Way, or Estimate the Distance?” ET 25 (1994) 333–341. Dion shows that the LXX seems unlikely. Only an inclination to privilege BHS on other grounds would lead one to set aside the LXX Vorlage in this instance and argue for a shorter text.

In 32.43, the Greek is twice as long as the extant Hebrew text—eight lines to four hemistichs. The longer text is not merely an elaboration of the Hebrew but adds significant details (including a reference to “all the angels of God”), which, given the generally conservative attitude of DeutTr, are best explained as text-based. A text from Qumran representing in part the source text of the LXX is extant.³ Let it suffice to note that the next verse (44) is also longer in Greek than in BHS, preposing the equivalent of “And Moses wrote this song in that day and taught it to the sons of Israel.” BHS is not identically rendered either. BHS’s equivalent of “all the words of this song” appear in Greek as “all the words of this law,” producing two subscriptions to the narrative. Indeed, throughout this entire chapter and the following one, there are notable differences between the Greek and the Hebrew.

Variance between the verse numbers of BHS and Greek exists in some chapters. Chapter 5 provides a good example. The order of the apodictic commandments is adultery, murder, theft, unlike the Hebrew (murder, adultery, theft) and unlike Exodus (adultery, theft, murder). Likewise, the list of clean and unclean food in chapter 14 shows variation in the number of some verses vis-à-vis BHS.

Less important, but equally intriguing, are the instances where, for reasons not always apparent, DeutTr chose to translate rather than transliterate place names or vice versa. Examples appear throughout with no observable pattern. In 34.6, “in the valley” (ygb) is read as a proper name “in Gai” (e0n Gai/); Abib (byb)) and Pesach (xsp) are rendered respectively as ta\ ne/a “of new things” and to_ pa/sxa “the pascha (= passover)” in 16.1.ff. The oft-quoted passage in 26.5 yb) db) ymr) “a wandering Aramean was my father” becomes in Greek Suri/an a)pe/balen o9 path/r mou “my ancestor abandoned Syria.” The difference might simply be due to wrong word division of an unpointed Hebrew text, or may be a contextualized interpretation to connect with “going down into Egypt.”

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF DEUTERONOMION

The problems inherent in “translating a translation” assume unique dimensions in each specific translation unit when one tries, in line with NETS policy, to achieve not only semantic fidelity to the Greek but at the same time reflect something of the style in which it has been translated. Vis-à-vis the NRSV as base text for NETS, this can mean that the former has been altered for either one or both of the above reasons.

DeutTr, as has been noted, is closely tied to his source text both in terms of what he understands the text to mean and in terms of its text linguistics. Therefore, when variation is present in the translation of common expressions, it seems fair to conclude that he was acting intentionally. I have striven to reflect this consistency in NETS Deuteronomion in order to signal precisely what is present in Greek. For example, e1kgona and spe/rma(ta) are both acceptably translated as “offspring”; indeed, the NRSV translates some of their Hebrew equivalents ((rz/spe/rma(ta) and Nb/ui9o/j) in this way. I have, however, reserved “offspring” as the translation of only spe/rma(ta) and have chosen “progeny” consistently to translate e1kgona; ui9o/j is, of course, “son.” What is relevant here for the NETS reader is that progeny will always indicate a particular word choice of DeutTr without indicating his decision about the Hebrew text; offspring, when found in the same place in NETS and the NRSV, may point to different Hebrew/Greek originals.

The reader will also find certain seemingly inelegant renderings for the Hebraisms so prominent throughout Deuteronomion. For instance, in expressions like fula/cesqe poiei~n,0kaou/sate poiei~na,nd so forth, I have regularly chosen “to perform” as a translation for the infinitive poiei~n, and “guard” rather than “keep” for the imperative, making for the awkward “be watchful to perform” or “listen to perform.”

I have also sought to reflect the imitative style of DeutTr’s treatment of Hebrew free infinitives juxtaposed to cognate verbs. So rather than translating e0a\n a0koh~0kaou/shte as “if you will only hear” (cf. NRSV), NETS displays “in/with hearing you will hear” and similar expressions throughout. Similarly, pleonastic expressions, as mentioned earlier, have generally been translated in full. The reason for this approach is not a desire for dogged literalism, but a recognition of the fact that DeutTr under the influence of his source text produced non-idiomatic Greek.

The treatment of the formulaic language should be easy to decode, but a few popular choices follow: klh~roj= “allotment , ” e0n klh/rw| = “as an allotment,” klhronomi/a = “possession” or “inheritance,” fula/gmata = “orders,” prosta/gmata = “ordinances , ” dikaiw/mata = “statutes,” kri/mata = “judgments,” martu/ria = “testimonies.” Such stereotyping is, of course, not always the case. This is particularly true of the frequently recurring verbal forms of klhronome/w. This verb and its cognates almost always translate 3 See the discussion of it in WeN, 533-535.

#ry irrespective of its Hebrew stem. Thus the appearance of klhronome/w in the Greek text signals, in the first instance, only that the translator was formally reflecting the Hebrew before him. Following DeutTr's approach to his Hebrew, I have utilized the English word "inherit" as a sort of default rendering of klhronome/w in Deuteronomion. The NETS reader may thus find some degree of tension at times between the word "inherit" and its context. When the choice of "inherit" would produce not simply tension but ambiguity in English, I have employed words like "possess," "dispossess" or "take possession of" as alternatives.

Again, I have routinely retained NRSV's choice of "to bring" (whether in or out) as a translation for the Hebrew verb ()wb mostly in the Hiphil) underlying both ei0sa/gw and e0ca/gw, although in some instances "to lead" seemed more appropriate. The simplex form of the verb a1gw, however, was always translated "to lead." Consistent with NETS principles, the NRSV's reading was retained when the Greek text is equivalent to the Hebrew, with deviations occurring only when the NRSV's word choice would violate NETS objectives on other grounds. I have chosen "guest" as the translation for Greek prosh/lutoj even though NRSV's "resident alien" might suffice. Also, where DeutTr used pa/roikoj, I have chosen the word "sojourn(er)," reserving "foreigner" for the translation of a0llo/trioj and cognates.

Similarly, while in the NRSV "slave" is used without distinction to translate Hebrew db(and its cognates, DeutTr differentiated types of servitude and servants. Thus, when oi0ke/thj appears in Greek, I have generally chosen "domestic" as the translation, reserving "slave" for dou~lo,jand "male slave" and "female slave" respectively as the translations for $\text{paidi}=\text{j}$ and paidi/skh . When the gender of the male slave is not in doubt, $\text{paidi}=\text{j}$ is translated in some instances simply as “slave.”

Of the same nature is the undifferentiated use of the verb “destroy” throughout the NRSV to translate a number of Hebrew verbs. By far the most frequently used verb for “destruction” in Greek Deuteronomy is e0coleqreu/w , a neologism shared with other Pentateuchal books. I have chosen “utterly destroy” as its default translation. The unqualified word “destroy” was reserved for the next most frequently used Greek verb, a0pol u/w and its cognates. In the handful of instances when a0nali/skw and its cognates are used, I have chosen “eliminate,” “consume,” or “devour” depending on context, whereas for e0ktri/bw , I routinely select “wipe out” or perhaps “rub out” in keeping with its sense in Greek. I generally have been spare with footnotes, assuming that readers who know Greek will check the original and those who do not will only be bogged down by excessive details.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Work of this kind depends on any number of resources, and I am happy to recognize my debts. Beyond the standard grammars and lexical aids, I was helped especially by the CATSS resources, notably the Parallel Aligned Text of Deuteronomy, by Wevers' Text History of the Greek Deuteronomy (=MSU XIII; Göttingen; Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1978), particularly chapter 7 dealing with the critical text of Deuteronomy, by his article on "The Attitude of the Greek Translator of Deuteronomy toward his Parent Text" (Beiträge zur alttestamentlichen Theologie: Festschrift für W. Zimmerli zum 70. Geburtstag [H. Donner, R. Hanhart, R. Smend, eds.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977] 498-505) and his Notes on the Greek Text of Deuteronomy cited above. This latter was unusually helpful when obscure lexical items or unusual Greek expressions made for ambiguous or impossible readings. In addition, C. Dogniez and M. Harl's French translation, Le Deutéronome BA (1992), though translating primarily Rahlfs' edition and operating on different principles from NETS, took account of the Göttingen apparatuses and thus was of inestimable value in many ways. Until a commentary on NETS Deuteromion is available, the reader is well advised to consult the extensive introduction and copious notes of this edition. Older English translations of Brenton and Thomson provided occasional assistance, but given their respective dates and their diplomatic nature, their help was not as valuable.

It remains then for me only to thank formally Albert Pietersma, general co-editor of the NETS project, whose insightful critique of a few sample pages of this translation helped sharpen my understanding of the finer nuances of the project on which we were jointly embarking. Whatever infelicities and inconsistencies remain are, however, entirely my own.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

For this translation I have made use of the edition of A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes, 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935). I did not deviate from its text or punctuation. At three places—in chapters 15, 18, and 19—Rahlfs presented the texts of Codex Vaticanus (B) and Codex Alexandrinus (A) in separate columns. Each of these instances involves lists of place names, often obscure ones. I have followed Rahlfs by translating these columns separately.

An earlier edition of Greek Joshua was prepared by Max L. Margolis in the 1920s and early 1930s and published as The Book of Joshua in Greek: Parts I - IV (Paris: Geuthner, 1931-1938 [repr. 1974]) and The Book of Joshua in Greek: Part V; Joshua 19.39-24.33 (preface E. Tov; Philadelphia: Annenberg Research Institute, 1992). Margolis and Rahlfs agree that the text of Iesous as preserved in Codex B is in many respects a close approximation of the Old Greek (OG) version as it left the hands of the original translator(s). But they often differ, both in small points and in their approach to the frequently enigmatic way in which the many place names of Hebrew Joshua are represented in the Greek traditions. My decision to follow Rahlfs should not be taken to mean that I agree with Rahlfs over Margolis in every instance. The easier accessibility of the Rahlfs version makes it prudent to give it precedence in NETS. In any case, Rahlfs will be superseded by the Göttingen edition, which is in the process of preparation.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE LXX OF JOSHUA

General Character

The Greek of LXX Joshua has been variously described as “one of the most interesting books of the Greek Bible,” “a thoughtful version” and “[striking] a balance between literalness and freedom.” By and large, it, like the corresponding Hebrew, is fairly easy to read.

Comparison with LXX Pentateuch

There are few, if any, indications of the specific date or locale in which the LXX of Joshua was produced; recently the case has been made for a mid-third century BCE date. There is indeed much evidence to commend the view that the person(s) responsible for LXX Joshua, while not feeling bound by the Greek translation of the Pentateuch, did make extensive use of this earlier text. Particularly instructive is LXX Joshua's use of qusiasth/rion, possibly to distinguish a "licit" altar from one the text condemns. So, for example, at 22.19 Hebrew wnyhl) hwhy xbz m yd(lbm xbz m ("an altar other than the altar of the LORD our God"), LXX Joshua has bwmo\ n e1cw tou= qusiasthri/ou kuri/ou tou= qeou= hmw~ ("an altar other than the altar of the Lord our God").

Variation in Translation

The Greek translator of Joshua, although maintaining standard renderings for a number of terms, also shows a marked tendency to vary them—and not just in instances of potential exegetical importance, as at 22.19 above. Another example of such variation is provided at 5.2 and 3. In both verses the Hebrew reads Myrc twbrx; the LXX has maxai/raj petri/naj [e0k pe/traj a0kroto/mou] in v. 2 but maxai/raj petri/naj [a0kroto/mouj] in v. 3. It should be noted, however, that in both cases the words I have placed in square brackets have no counterpart in MT and may be textual rather than translational. The Hebrew idiom “to blow the horn” always requires the preposition _b, as in 6.13: twrpw#b (wqtw). On occasion, LXX Joshua follows suit, as in this same verse: kai\ oi9 i9erei=j e0sa/lpisan tai=j sa/lpigci, though without explicitly reproducing the Hebrew preposition. Elsewhere and even in close proximity (v. 16), however, the Greek verb alone is made to suffice (e0sa/lpisaj oi9 i9erei=j). The former I have translated as “sounded with the trumpets” but the latter as “trumpeted”. Among individual and recurring words that the Greek translator handled differently throughout the book of Joshua are db((dou=loj, qera/pwn, pai=j) and hwc (e0nte/l omai, sunta/ssw).

Relationship between MT and LXX

The determination of the relationship between the MT and the OG of Joshua has attracted considerable scholarly debate in the last few decades. Overall, it has been estimated, the Greek version of Joshua is 4-5% shorter than the MT.

This percentage should not obscure the variety of differences between the Greek and Hebrew. (1) In many small details (which are often qualitative rather than quantitative), the two traditions differ. Three examples from proper names are instructive in this regard: throughout chapter 7, Nk(becomes Axar; qdc-ynd) is Adwnibezek in chapter 10; and the site where Iesus/Joshua assembles the Israelites for the last time (in chapter 24) is Mk# in the MT, Shlw in the LXX.

(2) Substantial differences of meaning occur, for example, in chapter 5, even when the number of words is nearly the same. In this regard, none is more dramatic than the LXX statement (5.4) that there were uncircumcised males among the Israelites who left Egypt: kai\ o3soi pote\ a0peri/tmhtoi h]san tw~n e0celhluqo/twn e0c Ai0gu/ptou— in the face of the MT affirmation (5.5) that all the people who came out

[of Egypt] had been circumcised: My)cyh M(h-lk wyh Mylm-yk. Also of considerable interest is the variation in the number of years the Israelites were in the wilderness (v. 6): forty-two in the LXX; forty in the MT.(3) In chapter 6, the LXX is 10% shorter than the MT, and in chapter 20, three verses from the MT are absent in the LXX. Fairly typical is this regard is 6.15 in the LXX: kai\ th=| h9me/ra| th=| e(bdo/mh| a0ne/sthsan o1rqrou kai\ perih/lqosan th\n po/lin e9ca/kij

(“And on the seventh day they rose at dawn and marched around the city seven times”), in comparison with the MT of the same verse. In chapter 20, vv. 1-2 and 7-9 are parallel in the LXX and MT; what follows in the MT as vv. 3-7 appears far more succinctly in v.

3 of the LXX.

(4) On occasion, the LXX has material not found in the MT, specifically in chapters 21 and 24. Especially notable is the reference in 21.42d to “the flint knives”: kai\ e1laben lhsouj ta\j maxai/raj ta\j petri/naj, which reappears at 24.31a as ta\j maxai/raj ta\j petri/naj. (It is worth observing that this wording differs from the renderings in chapter 5, noted above.) LXX Joshua concludes with two verses (33a-b) that form a distinctive link (vis-à-vis the MT) with the following book of Judges.

The majority of contemporary scholars locate many, if not most, of these differences, especially the larger ones, in a Hebrew Vorlage of the LXX that differed from the MT in these respects. Other scholars would allow a far greater role for interpretive activity on the part of those responsible for LXX Joshua. My translation does not depend on the acceptance of one or the other view or any permutation of them.

Hebraisms

In working through LXX Joshua, I have come to acknowledge what I would term the translation's (translator's) strengths and weaknesses. Preeminent among the strengths, as I see them, is a sincere desire on the part of the translator to convey to his (original) audience the sense and the structure of his Hebrew Vorlage as he understood them. His retention of some Hebraisms may well have made his version tough going for all but those who were truly bilingual, but his dedication to the base text does not seem to have flagged, except perhaps in the long and involved lists of place names that predominate in the book's mid-section.

In addition to several Hebraisms mentioned earlier, I highlight here two other instances, one found only once in lesous, the other, recurrent. At 14.9, MT yhl) hwhy yrx) t)lm yk is rendered, somewhat freely, by the NRSV as "because you have wholeheartedly followed the LORD my God." Initially I had translated the corresponding Greek—o3ti prosete/qhj e0pakolouqh=sai o0pi/sw kuri/ou tou= qeou= h9mw~n—as

"because you have continued to follow closely after the Lord our God." Since prosti/qhmi regularly renders Ps) with the meaning "continue to"—although the Greek verb does not have this meaning outside of the LXX—I determined that "continue to," rather than "add to" (the common, non-LXX meaning) would be appropriate. I finally settled on "apply oneself to" (so, "because you have applied yourself to") as the rendering that best suited the context.

The Hebrew at 24.13, hb t(gy-)l r#) Cr) ("land on which you had not labored"), would be adequately and effectively rendered into Greek by $\gamma\eta\nu\epsilon\phi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\epsilon\kappa\omicron\pi\iota\alpha/\sigma\alpha\tau\epsilon$; the fuller LXX, $\tau\omicron\upsilon\theta\acute{\iota}\nu\tau\epsilon\sigma$, is clearly not a “natural” or “normal” koine idiom and can only be explained as a reflex of $\text{h}\bar{\text{b}}$ in the source text. The NETS translation, “a land, that on which you did not labor,” is an attempt to reflect the awkwardness of the Greek.

Transliteration

To illustrate the difficulties faced by the modern researcher
—as well, I suspect, as the ancient translato the reader of ieous

tor and those who transmitted his words—we may look at a small section of the several chapters and many verses devoted to lists, specifically chapter 19.3-4 (describing a portion of the territory allotted to Symeon [LXX] or Simeon [MT]). What follows in transcription is Codex Vaticanus (B), Codex Alexandrinus (A), and the MT (as rendered in the NRSV):

MT

3 And Harsola and Bola

3 and Hasersoual and Bathoul

3 Hazar-shual, Balah,

and Asom

and Bola and Asom

Ezem,

4 and Elthoula and Boula

4 and Elthoulad and Herma

4 Eltolad, Bethul,

and Herma

Hormah,

In his version, Max Margolis (see above) reconstructed the oldest Greek of these verses in this way: 3 kai Asar Swal kai Bwla kai Asem 4 kai Elqwlad kai Beqoul kai Erma.

In arriving at these transcriptions he relied heavily on the Onomasticon of Eusebius, resorting to conjecture (only) in the case of Asem. It was Margolis' judgment that Codex Alexandrinus, as a chief exemplar of his Constantinopolitan group, was on the whole a better witness than Codex Vaticanus to the earliest forms of place names, especially rare ones, although (as can be seen here) its testimony is far from faultless.

Other Translation Issues

I have wrestled with several other practices on the part of LXX Joshua. In particular, I decided, in accordance with NETS policy, not to smooth out the many rough edges of the translation. Where sentences lack syntactic cohesion, I indicate this, often with one or more dashes. An example of this is found at 7.14: kai\ e1stai h9 fulh/, h4n a2n dei/ch| ku/rioj, prosa/cete kata\ dh/mouj, “And it shall be that the tribe that the Lord shows—you shall bring it near by districts.”

In one case, I would have wished to part company with my NETS colleagues. It seems to me that, in the majority of cases, LXX Joshua’s pro\j (or e0pi\) qa/lassan should be translated “westward” (or “to the West”), rather than “seaward” or “to the sea.” This is especially the case when the translator clearly understood other, parallel terms as directional, as in 18.12ff, where e0pi\ th\n qa/lassan and pro\j qa/lassan are in parallel with a0po\ borra=, a0po\ libo/j and similar terms. The use of “sea” as a directional designation is without parallel in extra-LXX contexts, thus precluding my use of directional terminology in my translation for this expression.

THE BOOK OF IESOUS (JOSHUA) IN NETS AND IN THE NRSV

The NRSV’s rendering of the book of Joshua is not as literal as that of its predecessor, the RSV. On a number of occasions, this can give the impression that the MT and the LXX of Joshua are more at variance than they actually are. Especially in the earlier chapters, I made a conscious effort to retain NRSV wording when it was a possible equivalent for the Greek; as time went on, I tended to up the ante, as it were, to probable equivalent. I sensed the need to reflect my perception of Greek nuances over against the collective responsibility to prepare an English rendering of the LXX that can be used synoptically with the NRSV.

EARLIER RENDERINGS OF THE LXX INTO ENGLISH

Although there are problems with both its Greek base text and the accompanying English-language version, it is still useful to consult Brenton.

JUDGES

EDITION OF GREEK TEXT

To date there is no fully critical edition of LXX Judges. The Göttingen edition has not yet appeared, and the edition of Brooke and Maclean is a “diplomatic” edition in which the main text is basically that of Codex Vaticanus (B). The NETS translation of Judges, therefore, is based on A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes, 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935).

In Judges Rahlfs based his edition on the readings of about twenty manuscripts. He identified two main textual traditions, which he believed were so diverse that they amounted to separate recensions (editions) of the book. He printed these as separate texts, designated A and B. NETS Judges, accordingly, offers a translation of both the A and the B texts.

Rahlfs based his A text upon Codex Alexandrinus (A) and two groups of manuscripts representing the recensions of the LXX associated, respectively, with Origen (c. 185–253 CE) and Lucian (c. 250–312 CE).

His B text was based upon Codex Vaticanus (B).

OVERVIEW OF THE TEXT(S) OF JUDGES

Subsequent scholarship has refined Rahlfs’ classifications. The manuscripts which are seen as witnesses to an A-type of text are now divided into three groups, AI, AII and AIII, of which AI corresponds fairly closely to Rahlfs’ “Origenic” manuscripts, and AII to his “Lucianic” manuscripts. Similarly, the B-type of text is now held to be represented by two related but distinct manuscript groups.

It is generally held that the “Old Greek” (OG) of Judges is to be found within All (the Lucianic group), particularly in a subgroup of All formed by the manuscripts glnw. (The Old Latin, a translation made from an early form of LXX Judges, is also an important witness to the OG.) The two main reasons for this view are that All and the Old Latin show less “kaige influence” than the other manuscript groups and that they show less evidence of “Hexaplaric contamination.”

“Kaige,” or “kaige revision,” is shorthand in Septuagint studies for a tendency, already observable in the first century CE, for earlier forms of the LXX to be revised towards a proto-Masoretic text (MT). This tendency is held to have reached its fullest expression in the Greek translation produced by Aquila (c. 140

CE). The revision towards the MT is notable for its use of “quantitative equivalents,” stock renderings of particular Hebrew words and phrases that seem to be chosen primarily to give Greek readers a sense of what was in the original Hebrew, with little concern for whether the resulting translation was idiomatic Greek. Of these the best known is the use of kai/ ge, “and indeed,” as the equivalent for Mg (“also”) and Mgw (“and also”) after which the entire revising tendency has been named. Other characteristic translations linked with it are: a0nh/r < #y) (“man”) in its distributive sense of “each”; e0gw& ei0mi < ykn) (“I am”), even with another finite verb; ou0k e1stin < Ny) (“there is not”). All of these translations occur in the A and B texts of Judges (though B alone has e0gw& ei0mi + finite verb: cf. 5.3; 6.18; 11.27, 35).

“Hexaplaric contamination” takes its name from Origen’s Hexapla, a work set out in six columns for comparative purposes. It is the conflating into one LXX manuscript of readings, which originally belonged in separate columns of the Hexapla, and the clearest sign of it is the presence of doublets, or double translations of words and phrases. For doublet translations in the manuscripts (including mss A and B) see Schreiner, pp. 90-104. Doublets are not entirely absent even from the All group or from the subgroup glnw, which is why the Old Latin is important in Judges as offering independent testimony to the OG.

Neither the A nor the B text consistently represents the OG. The A text stands somewhat closer to it but still contains many examples of kaige revision and Hexaplaric contamination. What is more, whereas scholarship in the decades before Rahlfs tended to stress the independence of the textual traditions represented by A and B, the large amount of common ground between them should not be overlooked: in many passages A and B are very similar, if not normally identical. The A and B traditions probably derive from a single archetype, of which they represent different degrees of revision. It is likely, then, that 196

to the reader of judges

the Göttingen edition, when it appears, will print only one main text, which will not be identical to either Rahlfs' A or B texts. Textually, therefore, NETS Judges is as provisional as the book's Greek text(s).

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

In what follows, a reference to either LXX A or B is always specified (e.g., 1.6A; 2.15B); references not so qualified apply to both A and B.

The Hebrew of Judges

MT Judges mostly consists of straightforward, clearly structured narrative, although it does contain occasional obscure words, e.g., hnctw in 1.14 (NRSV, “she dismounted”) or verses, e.g., 18.7, and there are some sections of narrative where the nature of the action described is unclear (e.g., Ehud’s escape, 3.23–25; Gideon’s attack on the Midianite camp, 7.16–22). But in general there is little that one would expect to cause a translator great difficulties. The one exception is the Song of Deborah in Judges 5, written in poetry generally thought to represent a more archaic form of Hebrew than that found in most parts of the Hebrew Bible and containing a number of rare words.

LXX Judges and its Vorlage

As it stands, LXX Judges (A and B) mainly represents a form of text very close to MT. In some cases, however, it is possible that LXX Judges is based on a different Vorlage.

So, for example:

1.14: “he urged her”(A), “Gothoniel urged her” (B), instead of “she urged him” (MT). MT is less logical.

16.13–14: LXX has several lines lacking in MT (see NRSV footnote).

19.2: LXX A “became angry,” possibly < xnztw (= NRSV) in place of MT’s hnztw “played the harlot.”

19.30: LXX A includes the Levite’s instructions to those who carry the dismembered limbs of his concubine throughout Israel (see NRSV footnote; in LXX A, however, these instructions are illogically inserted after the Israelites’ response to this horrible message and not where NRSV might be taken to imply).

On other occasions the translator seems to have had a consonantal text identical to MT, but he apparently divided the consonants differently or supplied different vowels:
14.14: lk)hm, “from the eater” = ti/ brwto/n, “what edible thing?” (LXX B) = lk) hm.

18.25: Klwq (m#t l), “do not make your voice heard” = mh\ a0kousqh/tw dh\ h(fwnh/ sou, “your voice had better not be heard” (LXX AB). Possibly (m#t has been vocalized as a Niphal, not a Hiphil.

Occasionally LXX has sentences in a different order compared to MT: e.g., the notice of Aod's (Ehud's) death in 3.30-4.1, especially in LXX A; the note about the location of the Ark at 20.26-28 in LXX B. In these cases the Vorlage was likely enough identical to MT, and the translation simply rearranges the sentences to produce what seemed to be a clearer or more logical presentation. Sometimes there are repeated elements or other dislocations in the text, which may be due to a scribal slip (e.g., in 18.8-9A; 18.16- 20A).

Some of the cases where LXX Judges seems to offer a reading different from MT are probably due to inner-Greek corruption: ε0po/rneun, "would prostitute themselves" (2.15A) has probably arisen as a mis-copying of ε0poreu/onto, "would go" or ε0ceporeu/onto, "marched out" (LXX B); ε0ciknou/menoi, "reaching"

(5.15B) is probably a corruption of an earlier reading ε0cixneuo/menoi, "searching out" (cf. the reading of LXX A α0kribasmenoi/, "inquiries"). Other examples are: 6.34B ε0fobh/qh, "was seized by fear" for ε0boh/qh,

"called out"; 8.32B ε0n po/lei au0tou=, "in his city" for ε0n polia=| α0gaqh=|, "with a good head of grey hair"; 9.7B ε1klausen, "he wept" for ε0ka/lessen, "he called out"; 15.18B eu0do/khsaj, "you have approved," by error for ε1dwkaj "you granted."

Selected Words and Phrases

LXX Judges is generally accurate, and it stays close to the sense of the Hebrew. But names and obscure words sometimes seemed to have caused the translator problems:

1.15: Mym tlg, “Gulloth-mayim” (NRSV; fn. “Basins of Water”) becomes “redemption of water,” as though tlg were related to l)g “redeem.”

to the reader of judges

4.11: Myn(cb Nwl), “Elon-bezaananim” (NRSV) becomes “Oak-of-the-Resters” in LXX A, as though Myn(cb were related to Nn)#, “undisturbed.” LXX B translates it as “Oak-of-the-Greedy,” seemingly linking Myn(cb with the root (cb, “make a profit.”

These translations are perhaps due not to simple error but to a desire to find theologically significant meanings in names by a kind of wordplay. But when LXX A translates xygm, the Hiphil participle of a rare root meaning “burst forth” (cf. NRSV “rushed”), as “was struggling,” this is probably no more than a guess. There are many such cases in Judges 5, where not only individual words but entire phrases seem to have caused difficulties. Thus, a comparison between 5.1-11 in NRSV and NETS reveals the following differences: 5.2: “When locks are long in Israel” (NRSV); “when chiefs take the lead in Israel” (= LXX A); “an unveiling was unveiled in Israel” (= LXX B)

5.7 : “The peasantry prospered in Israel, they grew fat on plunder” (NRSV); “a spokesman was lacking in Israel; he was lacking” (= LXX A); “mighty ones were lacking in Israel; they were lacking”

(= LXX B)

5.8 “When new gods were chosen, then war was in the gates” (NRSV); “they chose new gods, like barley bread” (= LXX A); “they chose new gods; then the cities of the rulers fought” (= LXX B) 5.10: “Tell of it, you who ride on white donkeys, you who sit on rich carpets” (NRSV); “mounted upon draft animals, sitting on covered chariots . . .” (= LXX

A); “mounted upon a female donkey at midday, sitting on tribunal . . . ” (= LXX B)

Some of the LXX translations in these verses seem little short of nonsense. The translator has made his best guess at the meaning of individual words (and in this it may be said that he shows his intent to be faithful to the Hebrew), but these guesses taken together do not yield coherent sense. In most cases it is rare Hebrew words that have caused the problem. Things become a little better as the chapter proceeds, because many of the difficulties are found in the opening section. But it is impossible to read a modern, philologically informed translation of Judges 5 such as the NRSV without feeling that it has come closer to what the Hebrew likely meant.

Transliterations

Occasionally LXX Judges simply transliterates the Hebrew. Sometimes this may be because there was no obvious equivalent to the Hebrew: the rendering of Myl(bh “the Baals” as Baalim (2.11; 3.7; 8.33; 10.6, 10) may fall into this category. At other points transliteration may have been the translator’s last resort in dealing with difficult Hebrew: 5.16A, mosfaqaim (NRSV “sheepfolds”); 5.22A, amadarwq (NRSV “galloping”); 8.7A, barkonnim, B abarkhnin (NRSV “thorns”); 20.6B, zema (NRSV “outrage”). At 5.7, frazwn (“spokesman”) is a recognizable Greek word, but one probably chosen because it resembled the Hebrew Nwzrp (NRSV “peasantry”) in sound. LXX B’s otherwise obscure translation of dwd# (“dead”) at 5.27 by e0codeuqei/j (“gone”) may have a similar explanation.

Word-for-Word Approach

It would be unfair, however, to focus only on the treatment of difficult words and passages. By and large LXX Judges conveys the sense of the Hebrew, sometimes with considerable skill. But it does so in a form of Greek that, by the standards of most ancient Greek literature, is not fully idiomatic. LXX Judges consistently reproduces in Greek constructions, which, while they are good Hebrew, are not attested in other forms of Greek or are only rarely attested. This is true of both LXX A and LXX B. In general LXX

Judges follows a “word-for-word” translational model. Examples of this include the following: (1) Particles

(i) MT’s standard connective w (“and”) is typically glossed as kai/ (“and”) and only rarely by other particles one would expect to find in other forms of Greek. de/ (“but/and/now”) occurs 18 x in LXX A and 12 x in LXX B); a0lla/ (“but”) occurs 8 x in LXX A and 3 x in LXX B; ou]n (“so/therefore”) 2 x in LXX A and 3 x in LXX B; ga/r (“for”) 2 x in LXX A and never in LXX B.

(ii) LXX Judges generally translates the relative particle r#) (“who/which/where,” etc.) well, using the appropriate form of relative clause. But in some cases the r#) clause involves “relative resumption,” ending with a word that refers back to the clause’s antecedent. In these cases LXX Judges regularly translates word for word, yielding a kind of double translation of the relative particle. Thus hb wkl't r#) Mkkrd,

to the reader of judges

“the mission you are on” (18.6), in which hb, “in it,” picks up Mkkrd, “your mission,” becomes in LXX A h(o(do\j u9mw~n kahq4n’ u9mei=j poreu/esqe e0n au0th|=, “your journey, on which you are going in it.” This is as clum-sy in Greek as in English. (LXX B has a slightly varied but equally inelegant translation.) Making a slight concession to English usage, NETS translates LXX A at this point as “your journey, that upon which you are going.” Other examples of the same phenomenon are: 6.10A; 14.17A; 16.11B, 26, 29; 18.5,6, 10A; 20.22A.

(2) Prepositions

(i) Hebrew can use the preposition b to mean either “into” or “in/among,” depending on the context.

Greek normally distinguishes ei0j followed by the accusative (“into”) and e0n followed by the dative (“in/among”), but LXX Judges uses e0n + dative as a standard equivalent for Hebrew b in either sense. This frequently produces what by the standards of most forms of ancient Greek amounts to an illiteracy. See for example, 1.2 (“in his hand”) and 1.3 (“in your allotment”).

(ii) A related point concerns Hebrew verbs followed by the preposition b, such as b l)#, “inquire of.”

At 1.1 LXX A renders this e0phrw&tw n oi9 ui9oi\ Israhl e0n kuri/w|, “the sons of Israel were inquiring by the Lord”; LXX B has dia\ tou= kuri/ou “through the Lord,” which is not much better. See also 18.5; 20.18, 23, 27.

(iii) The Hebrew preposition Nyb “between” is characteristically repeated in phrases of the type “between X and Y.” An example is l) tyb Nybw hmrh Nb (4.5), which LXX A renders a0na\ me/son Rama kai a0na\ me/son Baiqhl. This can only be rendered (unidiomatically) as “between Rama and between Baithel.”

LXX B has something very similar. See also 4.17; 9.23; 11.27; 13.25; 16.31.

(iv) Another preposition that is sometimes repeated is k, “as/like,” in phrases of the type “X and Y alike.” Thus at 8.18 we read Mhwmk Kwmk (NRSV, “as you are, so were they”). LXX A renders this o#moioj soi/ o3moioj au0tw~n, “one like you was like (of) them.”

(3) Verbs

(i) The Hebrew infinitive absolute is used to represent simultaneous action in an phrase such as Klyw Kwlh lk)w in 14.9 (NRSV, “and went on, eating as he went”). LXX A renders this phrase kai\ e0poreu/qh kai\ poreuo/menoj kai\ e1sqwn, “and went on, going and eating” (cf. LXX B). See also 4.24.

(ii) The infinitive absolute is also used to reinforce a finite verb from the same root. NRSV translates such phrases in a variety of ways: 7.19: “they had just set the watch”; 8.25: “we will willingly give”; 11.30:

“if you will give”; 13.22: “we shall surely die.” LXX Judges translates such expressions in one of two ways: either reinforcing the verb with a cognate noun in the dative (7.19A e0ge/rsei h1geiren, “he roused . . . with a rousing”; 13.22: qana/tw| a0poqanou/meqa “we shall die by death”) or reinforcing it with a participle (7.19B e0gei/rontej h1geiran, “rousing they roused”; 8.25 dido/ntej dw&somen, “giving we will give”). Neither is good Greek. See also 15.2; 15.13; 16.11; 17.3; 21.5.

(iii) Biblical Hebrew uses Psy (Qal or Hiphil) followed by the infinitive construct of another verb to denote “doing something again”: tw#(l l)r#y ynb wpsyw, “the Israelites again did” (3.12), or, negatively #yrwhl Pysw))l, “I shall no longer drive out” (2.21). LXX translates this idiom literally, using prosti/qhmi followed by an infinitive: 3.12 kai\ prose/qento oi9 ui9oi\ Israhl poih=sai, “and the sons of Israel added to do”; 2.21 ou0 prosqh/sw tou= e0ca=rai, “I will not add to remove.” See also 4.1; 8.28; 9.37; 10.6, 13; 13.1, 23; 20.22, 23, 28. See also the translation of the analogous construction tw#(l)lpm at 13.19 as kai\ diexw&risen poih=sai, “and he separated to act” (LXX B).

(4) Idioms with “Man” and “Woman”

(i) In Hebrew #y), “man” (singular) is used in a distributive sense, e.g., wtlxnl #y), “each to his inheritance” (2.6). LXX generally translates this construction word for word: a0nh\r ei0j th\n klhronomi/an au0tou=, “a man . . . to his inheritance” (2.6B; see also 7.22; 10.18; 16.5; 21.1, 21-22, 25B). On four occasions, however, LXX A translates this construction more idiomatically, with *e3kasto*j, “each,” at 2.6; 7.21; 9.49; and 21.25.

(ii) The singulars of #y) and h#), “woman” can also be used in a collective sense to denote a group of men or women; for instance: l)r#y #y) (NRSV, “the men of Israel,” “the Israelites”); Nmynbm hdm#n h#) (21.16; NRSV, “there are no women left in Benjamin”). LXX Judges sometimes translates such phrases literally, using the singular in contexts that demand the plural, with awkward effect (7.23; 20.15B, 36, 39A; 21.1A, 16). On other occasions the plural is used: #y) Pl) tw)m (br) at 20.17 is rendered tetrako/siai xilia/dej a0ndrw~n, “four hundred thousand m d en”; cf. 20.15A. At 20.39 and 21.1 LXX B translates #y) collective with oi9 ui9oi\ Israhl, “the sons of Israel,” which suits the context better than the literal translation of LXX A.

(5) Miscellaneous

Here is a further selection of unidiomatic phrases and odd-seeming translations in LXX Judges behind which a particular Hebrew word or idiom may be recognized:

2.1: "I will not scatter my covenant" = LXX; NRSV, "I will never break my covenant."

3.22: "he even drove the hilt in after the flame" = LXX; NRSV, "after the blade."

6.13, 15: "by me, Lord" = LXX; NRSV, "but sir."

7.17: "you will see from me" = LXX; NRSV, "look at me."

8.35: "they did not do mercy with" = LXX; NRSV, "they did not exhibit loyalty to."

9.17: "cast his life in opposition" = LXX A; "cast forth his life in opposition" = LXX B; NRSV, "risked his life."

14.7: "she was pleasing before Sampson" = LXX A; "she was made straight in Sampson's sight"

= LXX B; NRSV, "she pleased Samson."

16.20: "I will go out as once and once" = LXX B; NRSV, "I will go out as at other times."

18.19: "you will be to us for a father and for a priest" = LXX A; "become for a father and for a priest to us" = LXX B; NRSV, "be to us a father and a priest."

19.1: “the thighs of the hill country of Ephraim” = LXX; NRSV, “the remote parts of the hill country of Ephraim.”

19.24: “the thing of this madness” = LXX; NRSV “such a vile thing.”

20.16: “All these were slingers of stones at a hair, and not missing” = LXX B; NRSV, “every one could sling a stone at a hair, and not miss.”

20.40: “and see, the annihilation of the city went up” = LXX; NRSV, “and there was the whole city going up in smoke.”

20.42: “overtook upon them” = LXX B; NRSV “overtook them.”

20.48: “and the cities that were found they sent off with fire” = LXX A; NRSV, “also the remaining towns they set on fire.”

21.19: “from days to days” = LXX A; NRSV “yearly.”

Translations such as these, it is important to note, reflect a deliberate choice on the translator’s part (or in some cases, on the part of those who have corrected an earlier text towards the Hebrew). It is not that the translator/reviser knew no better than to write pidgin-Greek. Rather, his consistent aim was that the translation should mirror its Vorlage as closely as possible, and so he has left within the translation many signals as to the nature of the Hebrew original. LXX Judges well exemplifies the “interlinear” paradigm, which informs NETS as a whole.

The translation here offered, in accordance with the principles of NETS, attempts to capture this aspect of LXX Judges by using English which, while grammatical, is at points unidiomatic, inelegant or il-literate. This happens literally hundreds of times. But the reader should not draw inappropriate conclusions about the LXX translator's competence from this aspect of the translation.

"Theological" Renderings

At points within LXX Judges there may be a theological issue underlying the translation. The addition at the end of 4.8 ("for I do not know the day in which the Lord will send his angel on a good journey with me") is an example: LXX speaks of God as intervening through a mediating figure rather than directly accompanying Barak, a type of interpretation that is more common in the Targum of Judges.

(E.g., at 4.14 the Targum has "Is not the angel of the Lord going forth to ensure success before you?" in place of MT's "the LORD is indeed going out before you.") Something similar may apply to the narrative of Gideon and the angel of the Lord in Judg 6.11-24. MT speaks sometimes of "the angel of the LORD/God" (vv. 11, 12, 20-22), and sometimes of "the LORD" (vv. 14, 16, 23). LXX has "the angel of the Lord" throughout, except at v. 23, where it seems that Gideon only hears God's voice and no longer sees any manifestation of God's presence. LXX seems to go beyond MT in safeguarding God's transcendence.

Compare also 2.1: the form of the angel's words in MT leaves it ambiguous whether he speaks as the Lord's representative or in some sense as the Lord himself, but LXX A and B in different ways remove the ambiguity.

At 5.23 MT has: "they did not come to the help of the LORD, to the help of the LORD against the mighty." LXX A translates this "because they did not come to the help of the Lord; the Lord is our helper, mighty among warriors."

The second part of this translation echoes Psalms in which God is described as

to the reader of judges

Israel's or an individual's helper (e.g., 18[19].15; 27[28].7; 113.17-19[115.9-11]), and that may partly explain LXX A's deviation from MT. Additionally, it may be that the translator felt unease at words which seemed to suggest that God stood in need of human aid and so translated the second half of the line in a way that made clear that God is Israel's helper, and not the other way around. (Targum, "they did not come to the aid of the people of the Lord, to the aid of the people of the Lord," seems to have been similarly motivated, though its approach is different.) LXX B is closer to MT.

In Iotham's parable, the olive tree speaks of "my rich oil by which gods and mortals are honored" (9.9

NRSV), and the vine speaks of "my wine that cheers gods and mortals" (9.13 NRSV). In these verses Myhl) could instead be translated as "God." LXX A at these points has "my fattiness which God and men extol in me" (v. 9) and "my wine, the good cheer of men, which comes from God" (v. 13), translations which avoid any suggestion of polytheism and perhaps also the idea that wine might make God merry (v. 13). LXX B has "my fattiness by which men extol God" at v. 9, an even more "theologically sound" translation than LXX A, but at v. 13 translates "my wine, that cheers God [or "god," for there is no article] and men," this last translation illustrating the point that tendencies in LXX Judges are not usually consistently attested.

Lastly, mention should be made of the bizarre translation of I(b)/MyI(b) as "she-Baal/she-Baalim" at four points in LXX A: 2.13; 3.7; 10.6, 10. Whether this arose through simple error (2.13 and 10.6 also refer to "the [female] Astartes") or as part of an inconsistently applied policy of denigration of Baal, it is impossible at this distance to decide.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The present English translation of Routh (the Greek spelling of Ruth) follows the Greek edition by Alfred Rahlfs, which is generally regarded as the best available for this biblical book (Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes, 2 vols. [Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935]). Departures from Rahlfs' text as the basis for the English translation are rare, except where punctuation is concerned. Rahlfs' Septuagint as a whole is based principally upon three early codices, not upon all available textual evidence, but for the book of Routh Rahlfs presumably was able to draw upon his earlier work involving c. 50 manuscripts. See A. Rahlfs, Das Buch Ruth griechisch als Probe einer kritischen Handausgabe der Septuaginta (Stuttgart: Privilegierte Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1922), which was not available to me, and Studie über den griechischen Text des Buches Ruth (MSU 3, 2; Berlin: Wiedmannsche Buchhandlung, 1922), also published in Nachrichten von der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen (Philologisch-historische Klasse, 1922) 47-164.

TRANSLATION PROFILE OF THE GREEK

The book of Routh is a fairly literal translation of the Hebrew, with the Greek text often matching the Hebrew in a word-for-word fashion. At times the translator reflects distinctions in the Hebrew that seem to be of no consequence semantically, as in the consistent representation of -l rm and l) rm (both meaning “said to”) as $\text{ei]pen plus dative (15 x)}$ and $\text{ei]pen pro/j (7 x)}$ respectively.

Not surprisingly, the Greek text displays a high tolerance for Hebraic modes of expression, retaining certain idioms like “uncover your ear” (4.4) and generally keeping the paratactic syntax of the Hebrew original. The latter is illustrated by the fact that w meaning “and” (etc.) that begins most Hebrew sentences is reproduced in Greek by the word kai/ (“and”) somewhat less than 90% of the time. Typically this is done even when the resulting Greek is awkward or unappealing stylistically.

Evidently the merits of this kind of close translation were seen to outweigh its disadvantages. By virtue of its Hebraisms, the translation had the power to evoke the original. Non-Jewish readers, no doubt, would have found it strangely worded or even obscure in places, but for the reader who shared the translator’s social setting, the Hebraisms in Routh must have been valued as highly accurate renderings.

To speak of a tendency toward literal translation, however, is to tell only part of the story. In many ways the translator exhibits a degree of flexibility and freedom in the treatment of the text. Renderings as completely regular as the example of ei]pen mentioned above are the exception rather than the rule, and the usual Greek equivalent was often rejected where clarity or other considerations came into play. An interesting example is the rendering of $\epsilon\gamma\omega\epsilon\iota\mu\iota$, “I am,” a feature of Kaige texts (of which Routh is one) by which $\epsilon\gamma\omega$ was distinguished from its synonym $\epsilon\gamma\omega$. This rendering, which is generally found in Routh (in 2.10; 3.9, 12; and twice in 4.4), is replaced by $\epsilon\gamma\omega$ alone in 2.13 and 3.13, where $\epsilon\gamma\omega\epsilon\iota\mu\iota$ would have resulted in difficult or ungrammatical Greek.

Often, too, a single Hebrew word is represented by a variety of Greek ones. Three different Greek words, $\nu\epsilon\alpha$ = $\nu\iota\eta$, “young woman” (2.5), $\pi\alpha\iota$ = $\nu\epsilon$, “lass” (2.6), and $\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota$ / $\sigma\kappa\eta$, “maidservant” (4.12), are all used to translate Hebrew $\text{hr}(n)$ when it refers to Routh, and a fourth Greek word, $\kappa\omicron\tau\alpha$ / $\sigma\iota\omicron\upsilon$, “girl, young woman” (2.8, etc.), is used when $\text{hr}(n)$ refers to the female workers of Boos (Boaz). Throughout, the attentive reader will find that Routh, like any translation, is very much an interpretation.

Not infrequently we find that information drawn from the context is inserted into a verse in order to clarify its meaning. These insertions are mostly minor; in a typical if prosaic example from 1.15, in place of MT’s “she said” the Greek specifies “Noemin said to Routh.” A more substantive insertion occurs in 4.8, where the next-of-kin removes his sandal, as in the MT, “and gave it to him” (to Boos), an act that is implied by 4.7 but not stated in the Hebrew text. Minuses relative to the MT are less frequent. Often they seem to involve words that were seen as superfluous, as with “days of” in the Hebrew text of 1.1. Several may have been motivated by a sense of propriety, as in the omission of “tonight” in 1.12.

Of course many of the differences between the Hebrew text that we know today and the Greek translation might have been present in the Vorlage (the translator's Hebrew text) rather than originating in the translation. Such was evidently the case with the name of Noemin's husband, which is Elimelech in our present-day Hebrew text but is Abimelech in the Greek text (six times in the book). The difference between the two names is only one letter in the vowelless ancient Hebrew script.

to the reader of routh

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF ROUTH

NETS Routh attempts to capture something of the character of the Greek translation. Like the Greek translation, the present English one is relatively literal. In attempting to reflect the Greek closely, it is a more literal rendering of the Greek than the NRSV is of the Hebrew. (For the role of the NRSV as the base text for NETS, see "TO THE READER OF NETS.") In fact, since the Greek often renders the Hebrew literally, and NETS Routh attempts to render the Greek literally, NETS frequently represents the Hebrew phraseology more closely than the NRSV does.

It follows that divergences of NETS Routh from NRSV Ruth in many cases do not indicate divergences of the Greek text from the Hebrew Masoretic Text, but rather stem from the different translation philosophies of NETS and the NRSV. Wherever possible, however, the wording of the NRSV has been retained so that it can be compared profitably with NETS. A somewhat free translation within NETS, Routh may, therefore, be the result of a desire to preserve the NRSV where possible, or it may reflect the necessity for grammatical English.

In many cases the NRSV does not translate the conjunction "and" into English, especially when it begins a sentence, or the NRSV renders it "now," "then," "so," or the like. In this matter NETS Routh is more conservative, generally translating "and." But where both Hebrew and Greek have initial "and," and the NRSV does not translate it, NETS Routh also ignores it, so as not to imply that the Hebrew and Greek differ. When the Greek uses the alternative conjunction de/, NETS tries to use a nuanced English equivalent instead of "and." In more significant matters NETS Routh tends to follow the Greek rather than retaining an NRSV translation that does not adequately represent it.

Generally the Greek words in the book of Routh are used in their ordinary meanings, but at times the linkage between a Hebrew word and its typical Greek equivalent apparently caused the Greek word (at least in “biblical Greek”) to be used in a Hebraic sense. Examination of Hellenistic sources has often turned up Greek parallels to supposed Hebraisms, but a residue remains that cannot be explained as ordinary Greek. Examples in Routh include kai/, “and,” introducing an apodosis or conclusion, o#ti, “that” as an asseverative (perhaps explicable as ellipsis); and e0n, “in,” marking the recipient of a thought or emotion.

That certain Hebraisms (but not others) were tolerated seems to point to the audience’s familiarity with them, due either to their use in earlier parts of the Septuagint or to their penetration into Jewish liturgical or other settings. If indeed the audience understood certain words and expressions in their Hebrew senses, rather than as ordinary Greek, one might justify a freer, more idiomatic rendering of the Greek than the present one. But in the absence of evidence (as is often the case) that these Greek expressions were so understood, and in keeping with NETS policy, I have adopted a conservative approach, translating the expressions literally except where the sense was in peril or where English grammar would not permit a literal rendering.

Here and there the reader might perceive overtones of the King James Version or other exemplars of “biblical English” (“and it shall be,” “look upon [favorably],” etc.). Similarly, it seems, the first audience of Routh experienced its Hebraistic constructions as the “biblical Greek” that they had come to know from oral translations. But NETS Routh avoids “biblical English” where it might obscure the meaning.

Thus in 3.3 NRSV’s ill-chosen “anoint”—a word restricted to ritual contexts in contemporary English—is rejected in favor of “apply oil.”

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Detailed comments on a draft of this translation by Peter J. Gentry have proven invaluable. The translation also owes much to the insightful comments of Albert Pietersma.

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

Since no volume of the Göttingen Septuagint is currently available for the four books of Reigns, the translation throughout is of Alfred Rahlfs, Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935), except in the few places noted. Rahlfs did not include any diacriticals for proper nouns, so the Swete text as reproduced in the Larger Cambridge Septuagint has determined whether names beginning with a vowel or diphthong should be aspirated.

The NETS translation of the OG sections departs from the Rahlfs text in only seven places: 1 Rgns 1.4; 9.24; 13.4; 14.20, 23; 2 Rgns 3.5; 7.21. Versification follows the Rahlfs text, with the numbering of the NRSV noted in parentheses.

TRANSLATIONAL PROFILE OF THE GREEK

In 1907 Henry St. John Thackeray claimed that the Old Greek (OG) translation did not include all of Samuel and Kings.¹ To simplify his presentation, he divided the text of the four books of Reigns² using the following sigla:

a = 1 Rgn 1-31

bb = 2 Rgn 1.1-11.1

bg = 2 Rgn 11.2-3 Rgn 2.11

gg = 3 Rgn 2.12-21.433

gd = 3 Rgn 22 + 4 Rgn 1-25

bd = the combined passages bg and gd.

On the basis of the presence or absence of two syntactical and eight lexicographical features in the earliest and best extant Greek manuscripts for 1-4 Reigns, he claimed that the Old Greek text originally omitted the bd portion and that the current text was the work of a later translator. The omissions in bg include the events of the life of David from his initial encounter with Bathsheba to his death, and in gd they extend from the time of Jehoshaphat to the Babylonian exile. Thackeray saw the omissions as prompted by concern over content, what he characterized as "The Decline and Fall of the Monarchy," and he found ready parallels in the book of 2 Supplements (Chronicles in the MT), which similarly omits the David and Bathsheba story and extended portions of the subsequent events.

In the light of the research of Barthélemy and others, it is now generally accepted that rather than representing a new translation, bd is the result of a later revision. Accordingly, the underlying translation has affinities with the OG of the rest of Reigns, but the revisions have distinct differences that set the sections apart from the rest of Reigns. However, those who accept that the text is a revision lack any agreed upon explanation for why only these portions were revised.

In a similar manner NETS assigned the Old Greek sections and the revised sections to two different translators, and while collaboration has been necessary at specific points, for the most part they worked independently, including the writing of the respective introductions. It is significant, then, that when the introductions were brought together in preparation for publication, each translator has characterized the overall Greek translation in similar terms relative to its relationship to the Hebrew Vorlage and the degree of faithfulness.

1 "The Greek Translators of the Four Books of Kings," JTSt 8 (1907) 262-278.

2 The Greek title is Basilei/wn; 1, 2 Reigns = 1, 2 Samuel; 3, 4 Reigns = 1, 2 Kings.

3 As will be noted in more detail, in section gg the order of the OG text varies extensively from that of the standard Hebrew Bible, and the text from 2 Kgs 22.41-50 (the beginning of gg) is included within gg as 3 Rgns 16.28a-h.

THE OLD GREEK TRANSLATION OF REIGNS

The Translation Process

The translation work involved two major iterations and several minor ones. The first major one concentrated on the text of the NRSV. Throughout, the NRSV and NETS were placed in parallel columns, and a synoptic relationship was maintained with the two texts aligned not only by chapter and verse, but by clause, phrase, and even word. Since the NRSV was the basis of the NETS translation, as few changes as necessary were made. However, the second time through careful attention was paid to the Greek text, and all necessary changes were made to ensure that the resultant text was faithful to the OG qua Greek.

The Old Greek Text

While Thackeray gave few specifics, he believed that each of the three OG sections was the work of a different translator. At the same time, they all share common underlying characteristics. The one characteristic he chose to focus on was the frequency of historic presents where past events are described using present tense verbs “as date-registering” and “to introduce new scenes in the drama.”⁴ By his count there are 227 examples in the OG sections of Reigns (close to two-thirds of all the examples in the LXX), but only 9 in bd, some of which he considered spurious.⁵ In 1 Reigns 17, seven occur in the first three verses: suna/gousin . . . suna/gontai . . . paremba/l ousin . . . suna/gontai . . . parata/ssontai . . . i(/stantai . . .

i(/statai. In accord with standard translation methods, this construction is not represented in NETS.

In terms of the traditional criteria, the translation is literal, though generally not slavishly so in the style of Aquila, and more specifically, overall it is isomorphic. However, the insistence on representing in Greek all of the frequent, redundant nominative personal pronouns in imitation of the Hebrew Vorlage would have sounded strange to the native Greek speaker. While Greek does at times use such a pronoun for emphasis, it is clear that this is not what prompts the translator but rather the presence of the corresponding pronoun in the Hebrew. It is as if the guiding principle was: leave no element untranslated.

Because of the close adherence to the Hebrew word order, the initial impression is that this is semi-tized Greek, and it is true that at the level of idiom numerous Hebrew expressions found their way into Greek and would have sounded strange to the reader. Yet at the same time, word order aside, with few exceptions, the grammar and syntax is that of koine Greek. In contradistinction to Hebrew (and Latin), Greek has in addition to the active voice and the passive voice, the middle voice where the subject of the verb is both the doer and the receiver of the action. Some Greek verbs only occur in the middle voice, while others are regularly middle in one tense and active in another. A study of all of the middle voices in 1 Reigns⁶ established that the presence of middle voice forms was not due to Semitic interference from the Hebrew text, but rather the Greek syntax follows normal Greek usage.

While the translation in general is adequate, at times it is so literal that even though the Greek matches the Hebrew word for word, the resultant translation says something significantly different. At the word level, Nrq “horn,” dy “hand,” and tyb “house” are translated respectively ke/raj, xei=r, and oi]koj with the same basic meanings. This is not a problem so long as the semantic fields do not move outside of their standard denotations. However, on the Hebrew side, Nrq (1 Sam 2.1,10) and dy (2 Sam 8.3) connote “strength,” “power,” and in addition, dy connotes “a monument” (1 Sam 15.12), while tyb (1 Sam 1.21) connotes “family,” “household,” none of which find any correspondence on the Greek side. In spite of this, with no regard for the context, the translator maintains the standard associations. Similarly, where the homophone yb “I pray” occurs, it is translated e)n e)moi/ “in/by me” with no regard for context, as if it were the inseparable preposition b with pronominal suffix.

At the level of phrase, a typical example is found at 1 Sam 9.21. The MT reads: ykn) ynymy-Nb)wlh (NRSV “I am only a Benjaminite”), for which the OG has: Ou)xi\ a)ndro\j ui9o\j leminai/ou e0gw& ei0mi “Am I not son of a leminite man?”

In contrast, in the same verse, Nmynb y+b# (NRSV “the tribes of Benjamin”) is translated/transliterated skh/ptrou Benjamin (“scepter of Benjamin”). This atomistic approach to the text where it is translated word for word with no regard for either sense or overall meaning occurs often.

Since the two languages belong to different language groups, the syntax of each does not correspond at every point, so close correspondence of the Greek to the Hebrew at times results in infelicitous Greek. The last part of 2 Rgns 2.23 reads kai\ e)ge/neto pa=j o(e)rxo/menoi e(/wj tou= to/pou, ou[e)/pesen e)kei 4 H. Asahl kai\ a)pe/qanen, kai\ u(fi/sato “And it happened, each one who came to the place, there where Asael fell and died—and he stood still,” corresponding to the Hebrew word for word, down to the pleonastic e)kei/ “there,” but the resulting sentence is not good Greek and concomitantly not good English.

One of the features of the OG is the frequent use of transliterations, though at times in unpredictable ways, since in the same context a word can be both translated and

transliterated. In 1 Reigns 5, Ntpmh is first transliterated amafeq in v. 4, and then translated baqmo/j in v. 5. In all, there are 25 transliterations of common nouns in the OG sections,⁷ but with none found in section bb. Since most of the Hebrew proper nouns have no counterparts in Greek, the translator has simply transliterated. For the most part these are consistent across all three sections, though some variation occurs, such as the dual spelling Shlw/Shlwm. Where the resulting transliteration has an existing Greek counterpart, such as Anna, it will sometimes decline as if it were a Greek noun. This is not always obvious in the Rahlfs text, since it does not include diacriticals for proper nouns (e.g., 1 Rgns 1.2 kai\ th=| Anna). Similarly, proper nouns with an existing Greek form, such as Ai)/guptoj (“Egypt”), are used to translate the Hebrew counterpart (in this case, Myrcm). At the same time, Ml#wry (“Jerusalem”) is always transliterated Ierousalhm in the OG of Reigns, since it is the only form found in the Greek translations of the Hebrew Bible. It is not until the Apocrypha that the declinable form Ieroso/luma (Hierosolyma), also found in the Greek New Testament, appears.

Two transcriptions are worthy of closer attention. First is tw)bc, as in the title tw)bc-hwhy “Lord of hosts,” found first in the Hebrew Bible at 1 Sam 1.3. In 1 Reigns, tw)bc is transliterated sabawq (“sabaoth,” 1.2, 11; 15.2; 17.45; in 4.4 the OG has no counterpart in MT). In section bb of 2 Reigns the translation is either pantokra/twr (“Almighty,” 5.10; 7.8, 25 [not in MT]; 19.10, 15) or du/namij (“host,”

6.2, 18). The gg section of 3 Reigns again has a translation, either as pantokra/twr (“Almighty,” 19.10, 14) or du/namij (“host,” 17.1 [not in MT]; 18.15), but it does not have a transliteration.

The second example is the consistent translation of Myt#lp “Philistine” as (o(/oi() a)llo/fuloj/-oi “allophyle(s),” first seen in the book of Judges (3.3, 31; for a total of 20 x), rather than the transliteration fulistim (“Phylistim”) found already in Genesis (8 x), Exodus (2 x), Iesous (Joshua) (1 x), Judges (6 x) and Sirach (3 x).

Overall, with the strong Semitic flavor so pervasive, this is non-literary Greek. For instance, the particle me/n only occurs once in the OG sections (1 Rgns 20.14), and then without a corresponding de/;8 and de/ is found 14 times, in stark contrast to the books of Genesis with 855 instances and Exodus with 402 occurrences. Further, with close imitation of the Hebrew parataxis being the norm, the standard Greek hypotaxis is largely eschewed. In line with the LXX text in general, neologisms are found in the OG sections, though only 4 are unique to these sections: e)pakro/asij (1 Rgns 15.22), au)la/rxhj (2 Rgns 8.18) a)pele/khtoj (3 Rgns 6.1a, 36, 48, 49; 10.11, 12 [2 x]), koilostaqme/w (3 Rgns 6.9), diktuo/omai (3 Rgns 7.6), o)luri/thj (3 Rgns 19.6).

It is not uncommon in the recording of a Hebrew oath to leave the apodosis unexpressed, perhaps originally having been signaled by a hand gesture akin to drawing the fingers across one’s throat, or something similar. The resulting Greek translation is a solecism (see 1 Rgns 3.14).

In the areas of slavery and children/youth, Greek has a more extensive vocabulary than Hebrew, and while several words are interchanged as virtually synonymous, it was deemed advisable to standardize the translation equivalents to signal word changes for the NETS reader. Perhaps the most jarring is the frequent translation of db((“servant/slave”) as dou=loj/ dou/lh “(bond) slave” (including Hanna, 1 Rgns

1.10), but the Greek is unequivocal. While pai=j is “boy,” it is often found in the context of slavery and is there translated “servant.” As far as youth and children are concerned, the following standard equivalents have been adopted: paidi/on “boy, child,” paida/rion “boy, lad,” te/knon “child,” neani/aj “young man,” neani/skoj “youth, young man.”

In line with the NRSV translation, gender inclusive language has been adopted where the Greek text supports it. However, where the OG translation uses gender specific terms such as a)nh/r “man,” gunh/“woman” rather than the generic a)/nqrpwj “human” (whether male or female), the NETS translation reflects this. However, there is also fluidity in the use of the terms as seen in the story of the lemnite who 7 They are: ailam, ailammin*, alemwni*, amattari*, amafeq*, bar*, bersexqan*, geddour, gomor, dabir, ergab*, efoud, elwai*, qaala*, qee, qerafin, iaar*, kinura, mexwnwq, nasib, nebel, neessaran*, oifi, raqm*, fel ani*.

Those marked by an asterisk are unique to the Reigns OG sections within the LXX corpus.

8 In the LXX as a whole, significant numbers for the occurrence of me/n are only found in the non-translational Greek books of the Apocrypha, 2-4 Makkabees and Wisdom, although the book of Job has 13 occurrences.

brought news of the capture of the ark of the Lord in 1 Rgns 4. He is variously designated as a)nh/r (v. 12), a)/nqrpwj (vv. 13, 14), a)nh/r (v. 16), paida/rion (v. 17).

In addition to the above, some words or phrases are used relatively frequently in these OG sections, significantly more frequently than elsewhere in the rest of the LXX. Of the 661 times that the preposition ἐνώπιον (“before”) occurs overall, 138 (21%) are in these sections, and 66 are found in 1 Rgns, the most of any book, LXX or Greek New Testament (the most in the latter is Revelation at 35 x). In contrast it occurs only 5 x in Genesis and 43 x in the Pentateuch as a whole.

For the most part the stereotypical pairings are to be expected, such as Νωε-κιβωτο/ἵ (“ark”), Κριβ-εὐλογε/ω (“to bless”), and δωβκ-δο/κα (“glory”). At one level the association of δωμ (“assembly, congregation”) and μαρτυ/ριον (“witness, testimony”) is to be expected, since it is found in earlier books, however not when the former means “appointed time,” but once the connection was made, it is used in the OG regardless of context.

1 Reigns

This is the longest of the three OG sections, and it sets the stage. In relation to the MT, the following verses are not included: 13.1; 17.12-31, 41, 50; 18.1-5, 10-11, 17-19; 23.12. The most significant is the shorter version of events surrounding the David and Goliath story in chapters 17-18.

While the Hebrew text underlying the OG is not identical to the MT, it nevertheless is quite close, and comparison to the latter proved helpful in understanding the Greek text. The Hebrew of 1 Samuel has suffered in transmission, though this is not readily apparent simply by reading the text. Rather it is evident when compared to the OG and the Qumran Samuel manuscripts. Note the following example: NETS 1 Rgns 14.41 And Saoul said, “O Lord God of Israel, why is it that you have not answered your slave today? If this guilt is in me or in my son Jonathan, O Lord God of Israel, give 'clear ones,' and if this is what you say, 'In your people Israel,' give, now, holiness." And Jonathan and Saul were indicated by the lot, and the people were cleared.

NRSV 1 Sam 14.41 Then Saul said, "O LORD God of Israel, why have you not answered your servant today? If this guilt is in me or in my son Jonathan, O LORD God of Israel, give Urim; but if this guilt is in your people Israel, give Thummim." And Jonathan and Saul were indicated by the lot, but the people were cleared.

NIV 1 Sam 14.41 Then Saul prayed to the LORD, the God of Israel, "Give me the right answer." And Jonathan and Saul were taken by lot, and the men were cleared.

The NRSV reflects the longer OG translation, as can be seen when compared to the NIV translation of the MT. However, the NRSV translators have done more than this. Consciously or unconsciously, they translate do\j dh/louj "give manifestations" back into Hebrew as Myrw) hbh, and then translate as "give Urim."

2 Reigns

While the overall characteristics of the text in section bb are the same as those found in 1 Reigns, there are nevertheless some 7 differences beyond Thackeray's observations. Already noted is the preference for translating rather than transliterating tw)bc ("hosts") and the absence of transliteration of common nouns, although only two of the lexemes transliterated in the other OG sections are found here: dwdg9 ("raid") translated e)codi/aj ("raid") in 3.22 and sustremma/twn ("bands") in 4.2; and dwp) ("ephod") translated stolh/ ("garment") in 6.14.

Third, it is surprising to find the expression kai/ ge intruding into this section at 2.6, 7. However, the manuscript evidence makes clear that these two readings are found in the earliest and best witnesses, rather than being later glosses.

Fourth, at 2.13 the expression e)pi\ to\ au)to/ ("at the same place") translating wdxyl0 occurs for the first of the two times in Reigns OG, the other being in 10.15 (dxy). Elsewhere in the OG sections the translation appearing first in Deut 12.15 (kata\ to\ au)to/ "according to this") is found (1 Rgns 11.11; 30.24; 31.6; 2 Rgns 16.10 and 3 Rgns 3.18).¹¹

9 In 1 Rgns 30.8, 15, 23 it is transliterated as geddour.

10 Not translated in NRSV.

11 In the Pentateuch and elsewhere the translation is frequently a3ma.

to the reader of the old greek text of reigns

Fifth, at 7.3 the verb badi/zw translates Klh (both: "walk," "go"). This is the only time this verb occurs in the OG of Reigns,¹² and as close as two verses later the expected poreu/omai translates Klh.

Next, at 8.7, rather than the expected Salwmwn used everywhere else in Reigns, including the very next verse (and the rest of the LXX), the declinable form Solomw&n occurs. The latter is the only form found in the NT (Matt, Luke-Acts, John).

Seventh, at 10.2 o(\n tro/pon (“just as”) translates r#)k (“as”). This is the default (but not the only) translation in the Pentateuch, Joshua and Judges. However, though r#)k occurs 20 times in 1 Reigns, o(\n tro/pon is not used. Instead a variety of other words with the same basic meaning are used (o(/j, kaqw&j, w(j, kaqo/ti, dio/ti). Thus in 2 Reigns there is a measure of selectivity.

Taken individually, some of these examples might be easily dismissed, but taken together they indicate either the influence of one or more hands or a change in editorial approach.

3 Reigns

Unlike any of the other sections, gg contains both additions not found in any extant Hebrew text and extensively rearranged text from within the section, and these Miscellanies are its most striking characteristic. Whole chapters are in different order. Sections are included more than once, some drawn from Supplements (MT Chronicles), while others have no known counterpart in the Hebrew Bible or the LXX.

The sections are: 2.35a-n, 46a-l; 5.14a,b; 6.1a-d; 6.36a; 9.9a; 10.22a-c; 12.24a-z; 16.26a-h¹³; also, chapters 20 and 21 are in reverse order, and 22.41-50, from the beginning of section gd, are included in this section at 16.26a-h. Where the source of the transposed text is known, the reference is given in parentheses. In many instances only parts of verses are included, and the material quoted might not be as extensive as would otherwise appear, since the end of known passages is not indicated within any particular “verse.”

The additions to 12.24 are the longest interpolation. They include 14.1–20, which is not found in loco and is not found in chapter 12 in MT order. Further, the additions include a duplication of the verses from the beginning of chapter 12 already included ahead of the addition. They serve to rehearse the events surrounding the death of Salomon, the reign of Roboam, and the rise of Ieroboam and concomitant revolt of Israel. However, all this had already been covered in chapters 11 and 12. The additions constitute a distinct recension and give at once evidence of an underlying Hebrew original, but an agenda different from that of the MT. To date, no a priori grounds have been established as a basis for preferring one recension over the other in toto.

Naturally this phenomenon has been the subject of discussion and debate, but there is no agreed accounting for it.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

The translation process was enhanced by various resources. The time-honored translations by Thomson and Brenton sometimes provided a starting point for a difficult verse but also proved to have been overly influenced by the Hebrew text (and possibly English translations of the same) at just such points. Tov's Hebrew-Greek parallel text has been invaluable, initially as worksheets where all the preliminary translation work was done. The integration of Tov's text into BibleWorks 7 facilitated preparation of this Introduction. Along the same line, the availability of a hyperlinked version of the LSJ lexicon within Logos Bible software made lexical work a pleasure. Though regrettably not complete at this time, MSL 2002 contains a wealth of important information that has guided the translation at key points.

Beyond the physical resources, my weekly adult Bible class proved invaluable. Since they knew neither Greek nor Hebrew, their focus was thereby on the NETS translation itself, and their observations helped shape English expression.

Finally, my profound thanks to Albert Pietersma. I have been privileged to work with him from the outset of the project, beginning with the NETS Translation Committee, and then throughout my translation work. His vision for the completed project provided guidance along the way and encouragement to persist. While his acumen enriched at many places, it is nowhere more evident than in the translation of 3 Reigns 7.

The NETS translation of the two Kaige sections in Reigns, 2 Rgns 11.2-3 Rgns 2.11 (= bg) and 3 Rgns 22.1-4 Rgns 25.30 (= gd), is based on the preliminary critical edition by Alfred Rahlfs, Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes, 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935).

In a few places I have disagreed with Rahlfs' edition. For example, he was correct to adopt to_n louda in 2 Rgns 24.1 and louda in 4 Rgns 21.11. Both readings show that the translator rendered hdwhy by an uninflected transcription (louda) instead of the inflected form (lou/daj). Inner-Greek copyists preferred lou/daj, which accounts for Rahlfs' readings in 2 Rgns 11.11; 20.5; 4 Rgns 8.19; 9.29; 14.10, 12; 17.19; 21.16; 23.27; 25.21.

KAIGE AS COMPOSITE TEXT

Most Septuagint scholars today agree that Rahlfs' edition of bg and gd (Thackeray's labels for the two sections) is a reasonable approximation (as a work in progress) to the text presupposed by extant Hexaplaric readings and a counterweight to the text of the so-called Lucianic manuscripts. A growing consensus further suggests that Rahlfs' text most likely represents a composite text, consisting of an underlying Old Greek (OG) translation (second century BCE) interspersed with "Kaige" revisions (latter part of the first century BCE, perhaps by a Jewish Palestinian school of translators), with the aim of bringing the OG into closer agreement with a proto-Masoretic text. This composite text is commonly referred to as "Kaige-Theodotion" or simply "Kaige." For further details about scholarly theories on the OG and Kaige in 1-4

Shared Features in bg and gd

Several translation equivalents and techniques are shared by bg and gd, in contrast to the OG sections of 1-4 Reigns. (1) Mg or Mgw was typically rendered by kai/ ge (c. 26 x and 17 x respectively: e.g., 2 Rgns 11.12, 17, 21, 24; 3 Rgns 22.22; 4 Rgns 2.5; 8.1) in distinction from kai/ in OG (c. 72 x). One can therefore infer that a Kaige translator/reviser was intent on contrasting w with Mg or Mgw. I have tried to flag this contrast by glossing kai/ ge with “and indeed/indeed.” (2) yn) - e0gw& and ykn) - e0gw& ei0mi were distinguished, even when e0gw& ei0mi was followed by a finite verb, e.g., e0gw& ei0mi e1xrisa& se ei0j basile&a e0pi Israhel “I am-I anointed you to be king over Israel” (2 Rgns 12.7[2 x] and cf. 11.5; 13.28; 15.28; 18.12; 20.17; 24.12, 17; 3 Rgns 2.2). Though gd is less consistent than bg, there too one finds e0gw& ei0mi plus a finite verb (cf. 4 Rgns 4.13; 10.9; 22.20), a barbarism absent from the OG sections of 1-4 Reigns.

(3) Though rpw# “a ram’s horn” is translated by sa&lpigc “a (metal) trumpet” in the OG (and Lucianic manuscripts within bg and gd), in Kaige it is rendered by kerati/nh “a horn” (e.g., contrast 1 Rgns 13.3

with 2 Rgns 18.16 and 4 Rgns 9.13). (4) The historic present tense, found over 220 times in the OG sections, is used fewer than 10 times in Kaige. (5) l(m “from” is rendered by e0pa&nwqen or a0pa&nwqen “from upon,” rather than by a0po& or e0pa&nw “from” as in OG (e.g., 2 Rgns 11.21; 13.9; 24.25; 3 Rgns 2.4; 4 Rgns 2.3, 5, 13, 14; 10.31; 17.21, 23; 25.5, 21, 28). These shared features set bg and gd apart from the OG sections in 1-4 Reigns.

Isomorphic Translation of Hebrew

Another distinctive Kaige feature, ubiquitous in bg and gd, is what may be called “rigid isomorphism”

or “extreme literalism.” Each constitutive element in the source text (apparently proto-Masoretic) is translated sequentially morpheme-for-morpheme or word-for-word, with the result that the Greek is often unidiomatic. Although this feature is not absent from the OG sections, it is more strictly adhered to in bg and gd (which is not to say that “normal” Greek does not occur). A few examples are in order:

to the reader of THE KAIGE TEXT OF REIGNS

2 Rgns 12.5 t)z h#(h #y)h twm-Nb yk - o#ti ui9o_j qana&tou o(a)nh_r o(poi h&saj tou~to“,for the man who did this is a son of death.”

2 Rgns 12.16 Mwc dwd Mcyw - kai\ e0nh&steusen David nhstei/an, “and David fasted a fast.”

2 Rgns 13.15 d)m hlwdg h)n# Nwnm) h)n#yw - kai\ e0mi/shsen au)th_n Amwn mi=soj me/ga sfo&dra,

“And Amnon hated her with very great hatred.”

See further 2 Rgns 14.28; 3 Rgns 2.4; 4 Rgns 5.3; 8.20, 22; 10.30; 11.11; 14.21.

Overworked pairings are hnh - i0dou& “see/behold” (c. 45 x in bg, 60 x in gd) and rm)l - le/gwn “saying” (c. 40 x in bg, 60 x in gd). The infinitive absolute plus finite verb was translated awkwardly by finite verb plus cognate participle/cognate dative, e.g., parocu/nwn parw&cunaj . . . qana/tw| a0poqanei=tai “provokingly you provoked . . . [he] shall die by death” (2 Rgns 12.14; cf. 14.14; 15.8; 17.10-11; 18.2-3; 23.7; 24.24; 3 Rgns 22.28; 4 Rgns 1.4, 6, 16; 2.11; 8.10, 14; 14.10; 18.30, 33). Oath formulae were rendered word-for-word, to the point where the standard default M) - ei0 “if” failed to pick up on the emphatic negative component of M) when it occurs in an oath, which resulted in an unstated protasis or apodosis, e.g., zh|= ku&rioj ei0 pesei=tai a)po_ th~j trixjotou~ (ouui~ sou)pei\ th_n gh~ “The Lord lives, if a hair of your son shall fall on the ground!” (2 Rgns 14.11; cf. 11.11; 14.19; 15.21; 19.8; 3 Rgns 2.8; 4 Rgns 2.2, 4, 6; 3.14; 4.30; 5.16). Throughout bg and gd clauses were not subordinated but simply strung together according to the equation w - kai/.

Stereotypes

Stereotyping in bg and gd sometimes results in negative semantic interference from the Hebrew source text. So, for example, the third instance of Mwl# - ei0rh&nh in 2 Rgns 11.7 gives rise to an oxymoron: “and Daid inquired after the peace of loab and after the peace of the people and after the peace of the war.”

In 4 Rgns 1.7 +p#m has the sense “kind/sort/manner”: “What sort of man was he who came to meet you?” However, the translator’s stereotyped equation +p#m - kri/sij results in an unusual inquiry: “What was the judgment <Or means of judging> of the man who went up to meet you,” whereupon Eliou is described as a hairy man wearing a leather belt.

Isolates

Etymologizing translations can produce isolates. In bg, for example, Hebrew Klmh t)#m was rendered as a!rsij tou~ basile/wijn the clause “and there went out after him a burden/portion ? from the king” (2 Rgns 11.8). t)#m was derived from)#n, which usually corresponds to ai1rw “to raise,” which in turn produced a!rsij, a word that is a poor contextual fit here. Another example is ta_j a)koa_j au)tou= “his hearings/reports” for wt(m#m “his bodyguard” in 2 Rgns 23.23 via the equation (m# - a0kou/w “to hear.”

gd has numerous isolate translations, for example:)wh-P) “he too” - affw (4 Rgns 2.14); trbk Cr) “a short distance” - ei0j debraqa th~j gh“~

fojr debratha of the land” (4 Rgns 5.19); lp(h-l) “to the citadel” - ei0j to_ skoteino&n “into the darkness <Perhaps secret place>” (4 Rgns 5.24) where the translator may have misconstrued the Hebrew noun to be hlp); hxnm “a present” - manaa (4 Rgns 8.8, 9; 17.3, 4; 20.12);)wp) “then” - affw (4 Rgns 10.10); hxtlmh-l(r#)l “to the keeper of the wardrobe” - tw~0pei\ tou~ oi1kou mesqaa“lto the man over the house of mesthaal <Or Mesthaal>” (4 Rgns 10.22); wxvh “the thornbush” - o(a!kan (4 Rgns 14.9[2 x]); Myd#kh ydb(m “the Chaldean officials” - pa&rodon tw~n Xaldai/w“na passing <Possibly incursion> of the Chaldeans” (4 Rgns 25.24) although the translator may have misread ydb(m as yrb(m. Isolate translations further illustrate the translator’s rigid isomorphism in both sections of Kaige.

Transcriptions

The translator's isomorphic approach is further underscored by numerous transcriptions of typically difficult or unknown Hebrew words. For example, in bg one finds: "araboth of the wilderness" (2 Rgns 15.28), "dried araphoth on it" (17.19), and "saphphoth from cows" (17.29). In gd a great number of transcriptions occur (c. 26), not including person or place names (cf. 4 Rgns 3.4; 4.39; 8.15; 9.13; 11.8, 12; 12.6, 10; 15.5; 16.17; 17.6; 19.23; 20.12-13; 22.14; 23.4, 5, 7, 11, 24; 25.12, 14, 17). Some of these may be technical terms and thus unknown to the translator, while some may have been institutionalized.

Neologisms

Apparent neologisms in bg include parabiba&zw “to put aside” (2 Rgns 12.13; 24.10); kol uri/zw “to roll kol uri/daj (i.e., rolls)” (13.6, 8); parazw&nh “belt” (18.11); e0chlia&zw “to hang in the sun (i.e., as a form of torture)” (21.6, 9, 13); e0pisth&rigma “a support” (22.19); mono&zwnoj “a lightly armed (man)”

(22.30; also in 4 Rgns 5.2; 6.23; 13.20, 21; 24.2; Job 29.25); and e0ce/leusij “a going out, way out” (2 Rgns 15.20). The translator of the gd section apparently coined one neologism, diaka&mptw “bend or turn about” (4 Rgns 4.34). In the very next verse, he translates the same Hebrew verb with sugka&mptw “bend together,” well attested in ancient Greek.

gd also uses a few words not found (thus far) in pre-LXX: susseismo/j “whirlwind/earthquake” (4 Rgns 2.1, 11; already in OG in 3 Rgns 19.11, 12); katw&dunoj “in great pain” (4 Rgns 4.27; cf. 1 Rgns 1.10; 22.2; 30.6); and seiroma&sthj “a barbed lance” (4 Rgns 11.10; cf. Num 25.7; 3 Rgns 18.28; Joel 4.10).

Calques

Occasionally the translator(s) of bg and gd made use of calques or loan words from Semitic, some of which, however, pre-date the LXX. For example: tntk - xitw&n “robe/coat” (2 Rgns 13.18, 19; 15.32); lq# - si/kloj “shekel” (2 Rgns 14.26; 18.12; 21.16; 24.24; 4 Rgns 6.25; 7.1, 16, 18; 15.20); tyrb - diaqh/kh “covenant” (2 Rgns 15.24; 23.5; 4 Rgns 11.4, 17; 13.23; 17.35, 38; 18.12; 23.2, 3, 21); bq - ka/boj unit of measure (4 Rgns 6.25); and #yl#h - o(trista&thj “the number-three man” (4 Rgns 7.2, 17, 19; 9.25; 10.25; 15.25).

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES IN bg AND gd VIS-À-VIS THE MT

bg and gd share many translation features, resulting from strict adherence to the Hebrew source text and Kaige revision, which set them apart for the OG sections in 1-4 Reigns. At the same time, both bg and gd reflect hundreds of small semantic variants from MT. A comparison of NETS with NRSV will spot many of these. These variants may be quantitative, ranging in length from a single word to several verses, or qualitative, i.e., the source text was interpreted differently. In either case, the composite Kaige text in both bg and gd reflects only partial revision towards a proto-Masoretic text.

The fact that semantic variations exist between MT and the Kaige text in both bg and gd, means that each section has its own distinctive features or translation profile vis-à-vis MT. Naturally, such features are conditioned by the way the translator (or were there two translators?) handled the details in the various narratives recounted in each section.

Here I do not intend to make a detailed comparison between bg and gd that would argue for or against the existence of two translators for these two sections. Such a project awaits future study. My more limited aim is to alert the reader to the kind of quantitative and qualitative variants visible in both bg and gd.

Distinctive Features in bg vis-à-vis MT

Many quantitative differences in bg are probably due to a source text slightly different from proto-MT.

In these instances the unwary reader of NETS (side by side with NRSV) might incorrectly conclude that Kaige is a free translation of the corresponding Hebrew. However, close comparison of MT with Kaige, along with new insights from 4QSama (first century BCE), show that many variants in the Greek are best attributed to a Hebrew source different from proto-MT or to changes that occurred in proto-MT after the Hebrew had been translated into Greek (e.g., editorial changes or errors in transmitting the Hebrew).

One may note quantitative variants in: 2 Rgns 11.22; 12.16, 30; 13.21, 27, 34, 39; 14.27, 30; 15.18, 20, 34; 17.3, 8, 28; 18.3, 14, 18; 19.8, 10, 11, 19, 44; 20.18; 21.1, 5, 11, 22; 23.1, 3, 8, 9, 15; 24.25; 3 Rgns 1.47, 48 (for discussion see Barthélemy, Driver, McCarter, and McLean).

Other differences are likely due to the translator/reviser. I count some 100 light interpretive touches.

Consistent with the translator's usual mode of translating, these variants are typically limited to one or two words in a given sentence.

Semantic leveling occurs. So for example, while MT distinguishes between r# "commander" (10 x, e.g., 2 Rgns 18.5; 19.7) and #)r “chief” (2 Rgns 23.8, 18), the translator uses but one, a!rxwn “commander.”

At other times, the translator differentiated where the Hebrew did not. For example, db(“slave/servant/minister/adviser/official” was rendered by pai=j “servant” or dou=loj “slave,” the latter typically in a deferential context (e.g., 2 Rgns 11.24; 13.24; 14.6; 3 Rgns 1.13, 17). Similarly, Hebrew brx “sword” becomes either ma&xaira “dagger” or r(omfai/a a large broad “sword” or “scimitar.” (The last two examples of differentiation occur in gd also.) In numerous instances the translator made a grammatical subject or object explicit. Sometimes the subject was altered in Greek (e.g., 2 Rgns 20.22; 21.13).

As instances of interpretation in bg from MT to Kaige (i.e., MT > Kaige) one may cite: “fourfold” > “sevenfold” (2 Rgns 12.6); “desolate woman” > “widow” (13.20); “the king” > “his father” (15.7); “turn [it] into foolishness” > “scatter abroad” (15.31); “playing on pipes” > “dancing in choruses” (3 Rgns 1.40).

In 2 Rgns 18.21, 22, 23, 31, 32 an anonymous “Cushite” has been turned into Daid’s wise friend “Chousi” (cf. 2 Rgns 15.32, 37; 16.16–18; 17.5–8, 14, 15).

to the reader of THE KAIGE TEXT OF REIGNS

A few translational variants are of a theological nature, for example: l)h “(the) God” > o(i0sxuro&j “the Strong One” (2 Rgns 22.31, 33, 48; 23.5); yrwc “my rock” > fu&lac...mou “my keeper” (22.3); yngm “my shield” > u(peraspisth&j mou “my protector” (22.3); ybg#m “my stronghold” > a)ntilh&mpwtr mou “my supporter” (22.3); lw)# ylbx “the cords of Sheol” > w)di=nej qana&tou “pangs of death” (22.6, contrast 3 Rgns 2.6, 9).

Distinctive Features in gd vis-à-vis MT

In general, the Hebrew source text behind gd appears to have been in better shape than that behind bg. Nevertheless, one observes many pluses and minuses in gd vis-à-vis MT. Two of the longest variants involve doublets. (1) Greek text missing at 3 Rgns 22.47-50 (= 1 Kings 22.46-49 in NRSV) actually appears in the OG section at 3 Rgns 16.28d-g. This doublet concerns the reign of Iosaphat, cf. 3 Rgns 16.28a-h; 22.41-46, 51. (2) gd contains a lengthy plus at 4 Rgns 1.18a-d concerning Ioram’s reign, which reappears with slight differences in the doublet at 4 Rgns 3.1-3.

Other quantitative variants are typically only a word or a few words in length. Minuses in gd (i.e., pluses in MT) occur in or in between such verses as: 3 Rgns 22.47-50; 4 Rgns 1.17; 3.13; 4.20; 5.21; 6.21, 31; 9.28, 29, 32; 10.14; 13.1, 13, 16; 15.14, 19; 16.11-12; 17.14-15, 27; 18.34; 19.6, 10, 15, 25, 34; 20.11; 21.7, 12; 23.17; 24.2; 25.10. Pluses in gd occur in: e.g., 3 Rgns 22.7, 53; 4 Rgns 1.18a-d (cf.

3.1-3); 2.6, 16; 4.36; 6.16; 9.16, 29, 32; 10.16, 21, 34; 15.25; 16.2; 17.32; 19.20; 20.21; 22.3; 23.16, 29.

Given the relatively good shape of the Hebrew text, many of the pluses here and elsewhere in gd may have been added intentionally by the translator to clarify the identity of a speaker, to avoid points of misunderstanding, to highlight certain items, or for other unknown reasons. In one case, 4 Rgns 17.32-34, Kaige reflects a doublet and several minuses whose overall effect, whether or not they stem from the translator, is to paint the Samaritans and their syncretistic practices in a harsher way than in MT. Sometimes the translator might have misread the Hebrew, for example in 4 Rgns 5.24; 6.25; 7.10, 17; 11.10, 14; 19.25.

Variations between the Hebrew and Greek texts, however the differences arose, also have a bearing on the complicated chronological problems that surface in gd and elsewhere in 1-4 Reigns. For example, in 4 Rgns 8.25-29 Kaige does not distinguish as clearly as MT between kings Joram and Jehoram. In 8.17

Rahlfs adopted the reading "eight years" (= MT) for the length of Jehoram's reign; yet another well attested reading in Greek has "forty years." Ambiguity in 4 Rgns 3 over the identities of the kings of Israel and Judah also adds to the complex problem of variant chronologies in MT and the Greek texts in Reigns.1

As in bg, so in gd one also observes hundreds of light interpretive touches, probably due to the translator (or a later reviser), which in effect have set the Kaige text apart from MT, sometimes in significant and fascinating ways. (Some examples cited below may be regarded as the necessary consequences of the translator's isomorphic mode of translating.)

Again, one finds instances of semantic leveling. In 4 Rgns 13.12 h#(and Mxl were leveled to poie/w (NETS "did" and "exercised" allows for better English grammar). In 4 Rgns 24.6, 8, 12, 15; 25.27 Kaige fails to distinguish between father Jehoiakim and his son Jehoiakin and names them both "loakim." This leads to further confusion in 4 Rgns 24.17 where there is another variant concerning the relationship between loakim and Sedekias.

Occasionally Kaige exhibits semantic differentiation. In 4 Rgns 2.2, 4, 6 Elisaie declares three times that he will not “leave” or “abandon” Eliou, a small change from MT’s “leave.” In 4 Rgns 10.27 men uses the same verb Ctn “demolish.” In 4 Rgns 11.9 Kaige describes Iodae not only as “the priest” (2 x in MT) but also as o(suneto/j “the wise,” perhaps picking up on the semantic component (dy in his Hebrew name (dywhy “Jehoiada.”

“pulled down (kataspa/w) the steles of Baal and tore down (kaqaire/w) the house of Baal,” while MT

On numerous occasions in gd the translator interpreted the Hebrew in a different way from what we see in MT (glossed here as, MT > Kaige). For example: “Elijah ascended in a whirlwind into heaven” >

“Eliou was taken up in a whirlwind as into heaven” (4 Rgns 2.11); “mantle/cloak” > “sheepskin” (4 Rgns 2.8, 13, 14; in LXX mhlwth& is used solely to designate Eliou’s sheepskin, cf. previously in the OG in 3 Rgns 19.13, 19); “eighty shekels” > “fifty shekels” (4 Rgns 6.25); “arrows” > “bows” (4 Rgns 13.18);

“king of Assyria” > “king of the Assyrians” (c. 48 x, e.g., 4 Rgns 15.19, 20, 29); “they did wicked things”

1 For further discussion of the different chronological systems in MT and the Greek versions, see E. Tov, The Text-Critical Use of the Septuagint in Biblical Research (2nd ed.; Jerusalem Biblical Studies 8; Jerusalem: Simor, 1997) 253–255 and studies cited there.

to the reader of THE KAIGE TEXT OF REIGNS

> “and they made partners and engraved <Perhaps engraved steles>” (4 Rgns 17.11); “he prospered” > “he understood” (4 Rgns 18.7); “one hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold” > “one hundred talents of silver and one hundred talents of gold” (4 Rgns 23.33); “the captain of the bodyguard” > “the chief cook” (4 Rgns 25.8, 10-12, 15, 18, 20). In 4 Rgns 11.4, 19 MT refers to captains of “the Carites” (yrk) and “the guards” (Mycr), while Kaige interpreted these as two commanders named “Chorri” (Xorri) and “Rasim” (Rasim). In 4 Rgns 2.12 the translator interpreted the expression “Father, father! The chariots of Israel and its horsemen!” (MT) as “Father, father! Chariot of Israel and its horseman!” (gd), apparently a designation for the prophet Eliou himself, not a description of other elements in the vision (similarly in 13.14 where Elisaie is given the same epithet). In 4 Rgns 8.1, 5, Elisaie is said to have vividly “sparked to life” (e0zwpu&rhse) the Soumanite woman’s dead son (MT reads Hiphil forms of hyx “restored”; contrast 5.7 where the verb zwopoie&w “to make alive” was used).

Some semantic variants in gd pertain to foreign gods or goddesses. (1) The translator consistently rendered hry#) “Asherah” or the Asherah pole that represented this foreign goddess by to_a!lsoj “a sacred grove” (4 Rgns 13.6; 17.10, 16; 18.4; 21.3, 7; 23.4, 6, 7, 14, 15 and cf. the precedent for this in Ex 34.13; Deut 7.5). (2) In 4 Rgns 1.2, 3, 6, 16 (and cf. 21.3) the translator interpreted “Baal” in an intriguing manner: Nwrq(yhl) bwbz l(bb “of Baal-zebub [i.e., Baal of flies] the god of Ekron” - e0n th|~ Baal mauni qeo_n Akkarwn “by the goddess Baal, fly god of Akkaron.” Oddly, the translator refers to this Baal using both feminine and masculine articulation (e.g., 1.2 e0n th|~ Baaw!here NETS supplies “goddess” and di au0tou~“through him”).

Previously, in 3 Rgns 22.54, the translator rendered l(bh-t) “Baal” - toi=j Baalim “the Baalim” using a transcription (Baalim usually marks the plural form Myl(bh, e.g., 1 Rgns 7.4; 12.10; 3 Rgns 18.18). Thus the translator perceived Baal in a variety of ways.

Finally, some of the translator’s interpretations touch on matters of a theological nature. (1) Where MT frequently reads “man of God” in reference to Elisha, for some reason Kaige preferred “Elisaie” (cf. 4 Rgns 4.16, 25, 27; 5.8, 14, 15, 20; 6.9, 10, 15; 7.2, 18, 19; 8.2). One might suppose the translator did this to avoid being vague or confusing Elisaie with others called a “man of God” (e.g., Eliou, cf. 3 Rgns 17.18, 24; 4 Rgns 1.9-13). However, in many other verses pertaining to Elisha as a “man of God,” Kaige did translate the expression word-for-word (e.g., 4.7, 9, 21, 22, 25, 40, 42; 7.17; 8.4, 7, 8, 11; 13.19). (2) If the variation in 4 Rgns 20.17 is not attributed to a different Hebrew Vorlage, then the translator has shown theological interest in underscoring the point that every word of the Lord shall be fulfilled: rm) rbd rtwy)l hwhy “nothing shall be left, says the LORD” - kai\ ou0x u(poleifqh&setai r(h~ma o$ ei]pen ku&rioj “and no word which the Lord said shall fail.”

In summary

There are numerous shared features in the so-called “Kaige” text of bg and gd that distinguish these two sections from the OG sections found elsewhere in 1–4 Reigns. The Kaige text itself is most likely a composite text which consists of an underlying layer of OG along with a scattering of subsequent partial revisions towards a proto-Masoretic text. In both bg and gd the Kaige text reflects a typically isomorphic word-for-word rendering of the Hebrew source text, to the point where one finds examples in almost every sentence of linguistic features native to Hebrew that have been translated quite mechanically into Greek. The longer pluses or minuses found in these Kaige chapters, vis-à-vis the traditional Hebrew text in MT, were probably not the work of a free creative translator but indications in certain contexts of a different Hebrew Vorlage. This is especially true for the bg section, where MT appears to have suffered many instances of haplography during transmission.

In the Kaige text in both bg and gd one also finds numerous translational variants, vis-à-vis MT, which resulted from: semantic leveling, semantic differentiation, specifying the Hebrew in a different way in Greek, small interpretive touches for various contextual reasons, and some theological interpretations, all of which have affected the Greek narrative in slightly different ways from the Hebrew story.

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF KAIGE IN bg AND gd

Throughout my translation of Kaige in sections bg and gd, I have tried to adhere strictly to the guidelines outlined in the introduction, “TO THE READER OF NETS.” In particular, in order to represent the predominantly isomorphic and stilted nature of the Greek text, I have intentionally used an isomorphic or wooden style of English, when demanded by the Greek. Even in verses where the Hebrew and Greek texts are semantically equivalent, the reader will observe that NETS (correctly) has the same essential meaning as NRSV, though the style of the NETS translation may be laborious English. In other words, in translating the Greek text, I have often altered the wording of NRSV in such a way that NETS reproduces unidiomatic Greek features using unidiomatic yet grammatical English.

to the reader of THE KAIGE TEXT OF REIGNS

EDITORIAL DETAIL

In matters of punctuation I have followed NRSV as much as possible. To assist the reader in making sense of Kaige's awkward rendering of $\epsilon\omicron\gamma\omega\ \&\ \epsilon\iota\omicron\mu\iota$ plus a finite verb, I have used an em dash (e.g., 2 Rgns 12.7).

An ellipsis indicates the unstated protasis or apodosis in an oath (e.g., 2 Rgns 11.11). Versification follows Rahlfs' Greek text with NRSV's verse numbers in parentheses where applicable (cf. 2 Rgns 19.1-44; 3 Rgns 22.44-54; 4 Rgns 1.18a-d; 12.1-22).

TO THE READER

EDITION OF THE GREEK TEXT

The NETS translation of 1 and 2 Supplements (a translation of the Greek Paraleipomena, the LXX title for the Hebrew books of 1 and 2 Chronicles) is based on Alfred Rahlfs, Septuaginta. Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta LXX interpretes, 2 vols. (Stuttgart: Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935) 752-811. Although this is not a fully-fledged critical edition since its collation base comprises mainly the readings of only three early manuscripts, nevertheless it provides a better running text of the work for translation than does the diplomatic edition of the book in the Cambridge series, which prints the text of one manuscript, noting variants in the critical apparatus.

General Character

The Greek text of this book has been relatively well preserved and derives from a type of Hebrew text fairly close to that represented by the MT. Moreover, the translation technique adopted by the Greek translator was rather literal with the result that its overall profile is to offer a word-for-word representation of the syntactical and morphological structure of the underlying Hebrew for readers of Greek.

As a result, variations in genre of the component parts of the Hebrew text are well reflected in the translation, e.g., speeches, prayers, prophecies, psalms (1 Suppl 16.8–36 and 2 Suppl 6.41–42), etc. Similarly, long sections of 1 Supplements are given over to lists of various sorts (genealogies, city lists, census lists, officials, clerical orders, warriors, etc.) occupying 1 Supplements 1–9 and 23–27 in particular. Here, too, the Greek parallels the very staccato structure of the Hebrew, as in the following example from 6.46, where the verb of giving expressed in vv. 40 and 42 has been omitted in the interests of brevity.

MT: r#(Myr(. . . thq ynblw

LXX: kai\ toi=j ui9oi=j Kaaq . . . po/leij de/ka.

NETS: And to the rest of Kaath's sons . . . ten cities.

NRSV (= 6.61): To the rest of the Kohathites were given . . . ten towns Some less literal renderings suggest that the type of Hebrew with which the translators were most familiar was that of their own time. As a result, on occasion they reflect the later semantic range of a term rather than its earlier sense. Thus, the term dy (hand) in the prepositional phrase dy l(, which in the past had frequently borne the metaphorical nuance of control and direction, is here mainly construed in terms of physical proximity, as in 1 Suppl 25.6: MT: Klmh ydy l(

LXX: e0xo/mena tou= basile/wj

NETS: near the king

NRSV: under the order of the king

Another facet of the literalness of the Greek rendering is the incorporation of certain Hebrew lexemes as loanwords, often as technical terms, relating, for example, to the temple in Jerusalem (2 Suppl 3.4

ailam “porch,” v. 16 serseroth “chains,” dabir “inner chamber,” “holy of holies”), as well as some of the musical instruments employed there liturgically (1 Suppl 13.8 kinnor “lyre” and nabla “harp”). Other examples involve genealogy. Thus, although the Greek renders the term Myrcm as Ai1guptoj (Egypt) in strictly geographical contexts, at 1 Suppl 1.8, when the same form is applied to the eponymous ancestor of that people, the name is simply transliterated as Mestram (NETS “Mestram,” NRSV “Egypt”). Occasionally, however, the opposite phenomenon is found, as in 1 Suppl 4.12, where the Greek translates the first portion of the compound name #xn ry(to render po/lewj Naaj (NETS “the city of Naas”; NRSV

to the reader of 1 and 2 supplements

343

The translators’ literal translation technique is also reflected in their divergence from the accepted norms of Greek syntax in order to render characteristics of the Hebrew phraseology more distinctly, as in 1 Suppl 11.18:

MT: Mtw#l dywd hb))lw

LXX: ou0k h0qe/lhsen Daid tou= piei=n au0to/

NETS: Daid did not want it, in order to drink it.

NRSV: David would not drink of it.

Whereas normally the articulated infinitive is used to express the goal of motion, here it is employed unidiomatically to denote the object of Daid's desire, which would generally be conveyed by the infinitive alone in order to parallel the use of the preposition -l in Hebrew.

A more widespread form of the above tendency is the use of calques, i.e., the stereotyping of translation equivalents semantically appropriate in only part of their range and extending their usage to contexts where their equivalency standard is much less acceptable, as a means of foregrounding the Hebrew construction. A good example of this is the calquing of the Greek preposition e0n ("in") on its Hebrew counterpart -b, as in 1 Suppl 13.8, where the simple use of the dative case would be more idiomatic: MT: twrnkbw Myry#bw LXX: e0n yaltw?doi=j kai\ e0n kinu/raij

NETS: with harp-singers and with cinyras

NRSV: with song and lyres

Hebrew idiom, unlike Greek and English, tends to repeat the prepositional phrase in compound expressions. Here, too, our translators represented this phenomenon faithfully in their text, as at 1 Suppl 20.8: MT: wydb(dybw dywd dyb

LXX: e0n xeiri\ Daid kai\ e0n xeiri\ pai/dwn au0tou

NETS: by the hand of Daid and by the hand of his servants

NRSV: by the hand of David and his servants

Fidelity to the morphology of the Hebrew sometimes led the translators to avoid idiomatic technical terms in favor of periphrases closer to the precise formulation in their Vorlage, as at 1 Suppl 10.4, where an exchange between Saoul (Saul) and his armor-bearer takes place. The accepted Greek term for the latter office is skeuoforoj; however, as the Hebrew form is made up of a compound expression formed by a present participle and accompanying noun, they adopted the same construction in Greek, as follows:
MT: wylk)#nl) LXX: tw~ 1raointi ta\ skeu/h au0tou

NETS: to the one bearing his arms

NRSV: to his armor-bearer

Nevertheless, the translation of Supplements is by no means slavish: there are several instances where the translators have opted for terms that both offer a reasonable representation of the Hebrew and also conform to the canons of Greek idiom. A number of these relate to technical contexts of various sorts.

At 1 Suppl 10.13 Saoul (Saul) is condemned for consulting a medium, referring to the episode of the witch of Endor (1 Rgns 28.8–25). The Greek equivalent e0ggastrimu/qoj of the Hebrew term bw) is a culturally appropriate form, as it too mostly connotes a woman who delivered oracles by means of ventriloquism. Similarly, at 20.6 the Greek employs the term a0po/gonoj to render the Hebrew dlwn (“descendant”), although in v. 4 the narrower term ui9o/j (“son”) is found in a parallel context. The setting at 5.24 is one of genealogical tables of leaders of the various tribes and the Hebrew term $#)r$ has connotations both of primordially and primacy. This dual semantic ground is well expressed by the equivalent $a0rx-hgoi/$ the translators selected. However, when the same elastic Hebrew term appears at 11.6 with reference to bearing office and in parallel with military command, the translators realized the need for nuance and chose to render it by the form $a1rxwn$ (“ruler,” “commander”). The same judgment applies to another reflex of that Hebrew root, $N#)r$, at 18.17, referring to officials in the king’s immediate vicinity, which is rendered by the technical term $dia/doxoj$, as, in addition to the widespread sense of “successor,” it also 344 bears the meaning of “substitute,” “deputy.” Another very felicitous lexical choice is the employment of the classical compound adjective $filoge/wrgoj$ (“devoted to agriculture”) at 2 Suppl 26.10 to render the Hebrew phrase $hmd) bh$). Encountered in the works of such Attic authors as Xenophon and Aristo-phanes, this place is its only occurrence in the Greek Bible. The term is extremely apposite in context, as the setting is not one of rugged natural beauty but of human endeavor in working the soil.

Where appropriate, one notes that the translators sought to express nuances implicit in the formulation of a Hebrew phrase. A good example of this trend is the clarification of the dispute between the commander $loab$ and $Dauid$ regarding the conduct of a census of Israel. At 1 Suppl 21.3 $loab$ remonstrates against his sovereign’s command. Yet in the following verse he is constrained to submit to the latter’s authority. This reversal, somewhat masked in Hebrew by the use of the simple copula, is idiomatically drawn out by the Greek particle $de,/$ marking a contrast from the preceding. Similarly, at 1 Suppl 20.3 the translators found an elegant solution to render the Hebrew phrasal construction of definition with r#), which obviates the need for a verbal clause by utilizing the parallel Greek articular construction, as follows: LXX: τοῖς λαοῖς τοῖς ἐν αὐτῷ; NETS: “the people who were in it”; NRSV: “the people who were in it.”

Despite its close affinities with the Hebrew, there are a number of cases where the Greek text diverges from its standard for various reasons. On occasion this relates to the context and connotations of a term, as at 1 Suppl 10.13, where the Hebrew text fundamentally indicts Saoul (Saul) for infidelity, being unfaithful in his relation to God in disobeying his commands. However, the framework in Greek is one of jurisprudence and the charge of breaking the divine law.

MT: hwbyb l(m r#) wl(mb lw)# tmyw

LXX: ἀπεθανεν Saoul ἐν ταῖς ἀνομίαις αὐτοῦ, αἰ[ὶ] νόμοις ἠσένη τῷ κυρίῳ NETS: Saoul died in his acts of lawlessness, which he had done lawlessly against the Lord NRSV: Saul died for his unfaithfulness; he was unfaithful to the LORD

Other instances involve contextual exegesis and the impact of parallel passages in earlier biblical books, whose matter is being reviewed by the Chronicler. Hence, the Greek description of Nimrod at 1 Suppl 1.10, with its addition of his prowess at hunting, has been assimilated to the account in the Pentateuch.

MT: rwbg

LXX: γι/γαι kunhgo/j cf. Genesis 10.9 MT and LXX

NETS: a giant hunter

NRSV: a mighty one

In a small number of cases it appears that both MT and LXX in their current form may be corrupt. In one of these at 2 Suppl 14.14(15) the Greek witnesses a plus referring presumably to a final tribe or people in the list of conquests achieved by Asa's forces.¹ The term in question, "Amazons," is not to be associated with the female warriors of Greek mythology (the preceding article identifying them as male), but it seems connected with a by-form, Alimazonei=j, occurring at 22.1.

MT: wkh hnqm ylh) Mgw

LXX: kai/ ge skhna\j kth/sewn, tou\j Amazonei=j, e0ce/koyan

NETS: Indeed tents of possessions, the Amazons, they eradicated
NRSV: They also attacked the tents of those who had livestock

THE NETS TRANSLATION OF SUPPLEMENTS

General Approach

The key principle guiding this translation has been to avoid overly interpreting the Greek, but to provide a close English rendering of the Greek's representation of the original Hebrew. In consequence, it has sought not to smooth over problems, but to allow aporias to show through rather than trying to solve them by offering one particular sense, which would naturally exclude other possibilities.

In accordance with general NETS policy, I have attempted to maintain the vocabulary of the NRSV version, where the latter is compatible with the MT and the LXX does not diverge from that standard. Although well preserved, the Hebrew text of these books is not completely intact, and hence scholarly editors have proposed a variety of emendations to improve on what are regarded as its secondary readings.

1 Curtis and Madsen, 381, 419-420.

to the reader of 1 and 2 supplements

345

NRSV, in turn, has adopted some of these suggestions, and therefore rejects the MT reading at such points. A good example is afforded by the textual variation at 1 Suppl 20.3 in relating Daud's policy toward the Ammonite captive population. MT followed by LXX indicates that he exacted severe physical reprisals against them; however, the parallel passage at 2 Rgns 12.31 states that he set them to work with saws as hard labor, which seems more standard practice in such cases.

MT: hrgmb r#yw

LXX: die/prisen pri/osin

NETS: he sawed (them, i.e., the people) with saws

NRSV: (He) set them to work with saws

On rare occasions it appears that the NRSV translation does not do full duty to the MT reading. Thus at 1 Suppl 14.15 both the Hebrew and Greek terms relate more narrowly to a camp or encampment, while the NRSV version interprets this more broadly as referring to the army.

MT: Myt#lp hnxm t) twkhl

LXX: tou= pata/cai th\n parembolh\n tw~n a0lofu/lwn

NETS: to strike down the camp of the allophytes

NRSV: to strike down the army of the Philistines

At other junctures the NRSV rendering has recourse to explanatory additions to clarify particulars, which may not have been fully unpacked in the Hebrew. Thus at 1 Suppl 20.1 the reference is to the passing of winter and the opening up of communications in spring, creating conditions conducive to initiating the campaigning season, a regular phenomenon for ancient societies but not a given for the modern reader. Hence, NRSV spells out the passage's implicit significance.

LXX: kai\ e0ge/neto e0n tw~0peio/nti e1tei e0n th=| e0co/dw? tw~n basile/wn
NETS: And it happened in the following year, at the marching out of the kings
NRSV: In the spring of the year, the time when kings go out to battle (interpretative addition/clarification)

Similarly, at 1 Suppl 21.1 the issue is one of instituting a national census, and so the term “Israel” relates to the population, not to the actual land, a point explicitly made by NRSV to remove any misunderstanding.

MT: l)#ry t) twnml

LXX: tou= a0riqmh=sai to\n Israhl

NETS: to count Israel

NRSV: to count the people of Israel

loab, as noted above, is to carry out the census and report back to the king on its completion. However, the form of the Hebrew here faithfully followed by the Greek is somewhat elliptical regarding what precisely loab is to bring, and so NRSV specifies this.

MT: yl) w)ybhw

LXX: kai\ e0ne/gkate pro/j me

NETS: and bring to me

NRSV: and bring me a report

On occasion, NRSV evinces the opposite tendency of condensing the formulation where MT may be guilty of tautology, as in the following example from 1 Suppl 20.1 where “force” and “army” refer to the same collective.

MT:)bch lyx-t) b)wy ghnw

LXX: kai\ h1gagen lwab pa=san th\n du/namin th=j stratia=j

NETS: and loab led out the entire force of the army

NRSV: Joab led out the army

Selected words and phrases

The Hebrew term ynb closely followed by the Greek (ui9oi/te/kna), which literally refers to sons, is frequently translated as “descendants” by NSRV (e.g., 1 Suppl 1.5, 6, 7, 8, 9) with regard to more generic clan genealogy.

Problems of Grammar

In Hebrew syntax the norm is to construct narrative paratactically, linking all the events in a continuum by the simple copula rather than highlighting the particular relation between the actions by, for example, assigning those semantically less significant to subordinate clauses or directing the reader's attention to important spatial, temporal or other features linking the stages in the evolving story. However, this procedure is highly unidiomatic in English usage, and hence the NRSV translators frequently vary their rendering both for stylistic variety and to render the above clausal relations more explicit. In contrast, NETS seeks to reflect for the English reader the full degree of the literalness of the Greek version.

In the protracted lists where the presence of the copula becomes highly repetitive, NRSV will periodically omit the connective to ease the flow in English, as in 1 Suppl 1.10

MT: dwrmn-t) dly #wkw

LXX: kai Xouj e0ge/nnhsen to\n Nebrwd

NETS: And Chous became the father of Nebrod

NRSV: Cush became the father of Nimrod

NRSV also punctuates the ongoing discourse by signaling a new episode, the introduction of a new theme, etc. through a more colorful term, as at 1 Suppl 10.1, which marks the transition from the genealogical lists of temple personnel to the opening of the historical narrative.

MT: l)r#yb wmxln Myt#lpw

LXX: kai\ a0llo/fuloi e0pole/mhsan pro\j Israhl

NETS: And allophytes fought against Israel

NRSV: Now the Philistines fought against Israel

Similarly, important temporal relationships between actions are underscored by appropriate language as at v. 4, where the severe conditions of battle prompt Saul's exchange with his armor-bearer.

MT: wylk)#n l) lw)# rm)w

LXX: kai\ ei]pen Saoul tw?~ 1raointi ta\ skeu/h au0tou

NETS: And Saoul said to the one bearing his arms

NRSV: Then Saul said to his armor-bearer

On other occasions the narrative focus requires a counterpoint between the reactions of two persons or groups, as at v. 11, where the Israelite response to the defeat at Mount Gilboa is contrasted with that of the jubilant Philistines:

MT: d(lg #yby lk w(m#yw

LXX: kai\ h1kousan pa/ntej oi9 katoikou=ntej Galaad

NETS: And all those living in Galaad heard

NRSV: But when all Jabesh-gilead heard

Result is another key narrative link whereby an action is marked as the consequence of the preceding, as at v. 6 depicting Saul's death from his wounds:

MT: lw)# tmyw

LXX: kai\ a0pe/qanen Saoul

NETS: And Saoul . . . died

NRSV: Thus Saul died

Purpose also forms a bond between actions, underlining how one is undertaken in order to facilitate another, as at 1 Suppl 21.2 regarding the rationale for conducting the census.

to the reader of 1 and 2 supplements

347

MT: Mrpsm t) h(d)w

LXX: kai\ gnw&somai to\n a0riqmo\n au0tw~n

NETS: and I shall know their number

NRSV: so that I may know their number

The NRSV translators also permit themselves a certain freedom in focusing their rendering on the semantic field rather than being constrained by issues of quantitative representation, as at 1 Suppl 10.4, where MT followed by LXX expresses terror by means of a simple verb of fearing modified by an adverb of intensity.

MT: d)m)ry

LXX: e0fobei=to sfo/dra

NETS: he was very afraid

NRSV: he was terrified

Often this leads to employing a more technical term appropriate to context rather than to MT's more general phraseology, as at 1 Suppl 10.10, where the religious context is explicated by reference to a temple:

MT: Mhyhl) tyb

LXX: e0n oi1kw? qeou= au0tw~n

NETS: in the house of their god

NRSV: in the temple of their gods

Similarly, at v. 13 the reference to Saul's infringing divine regulations leads the translators to select the more specific term "command" over the broader Hebrew lexeme rbd "word."

MT: hwhy rbd l(

LXX: (kata\ to\n lo/gon tou= kuri/ou

NETS: (according to) the Lord's word

NRSV: the command of the Lord

Likewise, in describing the prodigious attributes of a gigantic Philistine warrior at 1 Suppl 20.6, the translators expand on the rather laconic Hebrew version literally represented in Greek, differentiating extremities of the hands and feet according to the idiom of the target language as "fingers" and "toes."

MT: ##w ## wiyt(bc)w

LXX: kai\ da/ktuloi au0tou= e4c kai\ e3c

NETS: and his digits were six and six

NRSV: six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot

Frequently, idiomatic expressions of time are employed more expansively than their literal sense would suggest, as, for example, in the phrase “yesterday and the third day” encountered at 1 Suppl 11.2, which clearly envisages a period of some years during which David led the Israelite army under Saoul’s reign, a point that the NRSV translators duly highlight.

MT: Mw#l#-Mg lwmt Mg

LXX: e0xqe\j kai\ tri/thn

NETS: yesterday and the third day

NRSV: for some time now

Very rarely do matters of theological exegesis loom large in a work like 1 and 2 Supplements. One of the few instances occurs at 1 Suppl 21.1, which, not surprisingly, is styled by Sara Japhet as “one of the most discussed and interpreted verses in Chronicles.”² The question at issue is the precise identification of the one who instigated David to conduct the census, Satan or some undefined slanderer. In the coun-2 Japhet, 373.

terpart to this passage at 2 Rgns 24.1 the perpetrator is God himself in his wrath. This the Chronicler has mitigated according to his normal practice by refocusing the intervention. At the same time, there is no indication that the author believed in a self-existing principle of evil. Moreover, when the Hebrew term N+# denotes a proper noun, it is normally found with the article, whereas here it is unarticulated. Consequently, in sum, it appears that a human instigator is intended.
